WEDNESDAY, March 22, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee that we still feel the upper shrine of life. Out of the inspiration that comes from Thy name we gather force for the duties of our daily life. All our plans rest upon the certainty of our knowledge of Thee. Our most sacred contracts are sealed with the sacredness of Thy name. Help us, we pray Thee, in the daily performance of our task, to hold Thee in sacred reverence and awe that we may be guided by the God of our fathers in the discharge of the duties of this day and of every day, and that our life work may bring to the people, through our devotion to God, continued peace and prosperity, and honor to the name of our God. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Monday, March 21, 1916, when, on request of Mr. LEA of Tennessee, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I rise to ask for a correction in the RECORD of yesterday's proceedings.

In the discussion upon the armor-plate bill yesterday evening the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] was kind enough to refer to the fact that during the investigation conducted by a Senate committee a few years ago I had stated that I was the owner of a thousand shares of preferred stock of the United States Steel Corporation. In that connection the Senator used this language:

> Mr. REED. I say, since the Senator wants to make it pointed, that if I owned $500,000 worth of the stock of any company engaged in Government contracts I would not plead for a continuance of those contracts.

Mr. President, the par value of the preferred stock of the United States Steel Corporation is $100 per share. The par value of 1,000 shares, therefore, as can easily be seen, is $100,000. The market price yesterday, as I see from this morning's paper, was $117 a share, which would make the ultimate value of that stock $117,000. So the Senator from Missouri in placing its value at $500,000 evidently made an enormous mistake in calculation.

The attention of the Senator from Missouri was called to this statement this morning, and he informed my secretary that he would be here this morning and ask that the correction be made. He has not so appeared, and I now ask that "$500,000" in this place in the RECORD, on page 4539, be changed to read "$117,000."

In this connection I wish to say, as I stated to the committee when I stated that I was the owner of that stock, that I have never considered this security to be in any way affected by any measure that came before Congress since I have been a Senator. It is a preferred stock. It pays 7 per cent. It can not under any circumstances pay more, and in the improbable circumstances of the profits of the corporation being insufficient to pay 7 per cent in one year the dividend will be paid out of the profits of succeeding years.

Even if it were subject to this legislation, the amount is so small compared with the enormous capital of the corporation that of any money that might be made out of the armor-plate business my share would be so small as to be infinitesimal.

Those who know me, Mr. President, know well that any vote of mine in the Senate will never be controlled by my personal interests. I have on more than one occasion voted in direct opposition to my personal and financial interests on measures coming before the Senate. I shall never vote in accordance with my personal interest unless the interest of the public and of my constituents demands it.

If my interest in this corporation had been far larger or if I had been interested in the securities of any of the other companies engaged in this business, as I am not, I would have acted and voted just as I acted and voted yesterday, for the reason that I believe the measure to be inimical to the public interests and injurious to the constituency which I aim to represent.

I ask that this correction be made, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hardly sees how the Senator from Pennsylvania can change the language used by the Senator from Missouri. The Senator has made his statement, and when the Senator from Missouri comes in, in accordance with his promise to the Senator from Pennsylvania, the Chair assumes that the Senator from Missouri will make the change; but the Chair can not change the language of a Senator.

Mr. OLIVER. I think the ruling of the Chair is correct, and I made the request to call attention not only to the misstatement made by the Senator from Missouri but to his failure to respond to an invitation to correct that mistake.

Mr. REED subsequently said: Mr. President, I desire to make a statement to the Senate that has nothing to do with this debate, but which relates to a correction of a statement which I made on yesterday.

On yesterday I read the evidence to the effect that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] owned 1,000 shares of stock in the United States Steel Corporation. A moment afterwards, in a colloquy with the Senator from Pennsylvania, I made this statement:

> I say, since the Senator wants to make it pointed, that if I owned $500,000 worth of the stock of any company engaged in Government contracts I would not plead for a continuance of those contracts.

This statement was made as to the value of the stock during the course of debate and without any time to look up values. When I used the figures "$500,000" I had in mind the figures quoted in the press as to the value of certain stocks. My attention was called this morning by the secretary of the Senator from Pennsylvania to the fact that this particular stock was not worth $500 a share, which it would have to be in order to make the aggregate $500,000, but that it was worth only $117 a share, which would make the aggregate amount $117,000. I stated to the Senator's secretary very readily that I would make the correction, but I left my office to come to the Senate just before 12 o'clock, and I was detained by a gentleman who called on me. Therefore, during my absence, the Senator from Pennsylvania asked to have the RECORD corrected on his own motion, so that the figures "$117,000" will be substituted for "$500,000." Had I been here, I would have asked that that be done myself. I arrived just a few moments after the Senator from Pennsylvania had made his statement.

I am entirely willing, and I ask that the statement be corrected, so that the figures "$117,000" shall be substituted for "$500,000." I am very glad to make this correction in the interest of accuracy.

All I have to say by way of condonation of my own mistake is to remark that it was quite a natural mistake for me to make, because I am not at all familiar with stock quotations and do not follow them. I am glad to make the correction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MYERS in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri being granted? There being none, it is so ordered.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. SHERMAN. I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it be read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 117) authorizing the President to call for volunteers to protect lives and property of citizens of the United States in Mexico was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and is hereby, authorized and directed immediately to call for volunteers and to enlist in the service of the United States a force of 50,000, giving preference to the Organized Militia of the several States, the term of service to continue until peace is restored and civil government sufficient to protect life and property is established and definitely maintained in Mexico; and be it

Further resolved, That the use of such armed force is to be limited strictly to operating within the territorial limits of Mexico as an auxillary to the de facto government of Carranza, if it be so permitted, otherwise that such forces be used in the capture of Villa and his band, who lately committed outrages at Columbus, N. Mex., and to maintain order in the northern provinces of Mexico and safeguard and protect the Mexican borders of the United States; and be it

Further resolved, That after the foregoing purposes have been accomplished that the President shall withdraw all the military and naval forces of the United States from Mexican territory and Mexican waters.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the joint resolution may lie on the table, and I further ask unanimous consent to make a short statement which will occupy about three minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, we could not hear in this part of the Chamber what the Senator's request is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request is that the joint resolution may lie on the table, and a further request is that the Senator from Illinois may be permitted to discuss the joint resolution by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. For what time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Any time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think it would be better to do that when the joint resolution comes up.

Mr. SHERMAN. Do I understand that objection is made?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will then ask the Secretary to read the statement in connection with the joint resolution I have introduced.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What is the request?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That the Secretary read the following statement in connection with the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Illinois. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will not object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

"Mr. President, the lack of military strength immediately available is apparent. The dispatch of a portion of the Regular Army into Mexico in pursuit of Villa has demonstrated the totally insufficient military force at the command of the President.

"I am apprehensive that Congress does not fully appreciate conditions on the Mexican border and in Mexico. We have a few thousand American soldiers with their officers in Mexico. They will soon be some hundreds of miles from our boundary. The railways of Mexico are demoralized in service and equipment. Tracks and bridges are easily destroyed. The communications of the forces in pursuit of Villa may be cut any hour. The press reports are not reassuring this morning. In case of an emergency, what military strength can be mobilized promptly and massed for the support or protection of our far-distant line advancing into unknown territory? Shall we wait until another Khartum has done for us in the annals of our history what it did for England in her neglect of Gordon? What will avail to wipe out the stain if we permit it? Will nothing but a massacre waken the dull routine of governmental action?

"I wish now to warn those in authority in the executive department that we are trifling with the lives of men, with the safety of our border States, and with our national honor more than some seem to appreciate.

"The men to be called under this resolution will respond, I believe. They will be ready for actual service if called now within a short time. If it be neglected, the delay, then, in a crisis will be a blunder, and the kind of blunder that is worse than a crime. The best method of redeeming ourselves from disaster is to be prepared before the disaster arrives. That is the purpose of this resolution."

ADJUDICATION OF PRIVATE CLAIMS.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6918) to relieve Congress from the adjudication of private claims against the Government, which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. POMERENE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4840) for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. TILLMAN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,250 for salary of a chief of division, Bureau of Navigation, Navy Department, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the rivers and harbors appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

CONDITION OF LITHUANIANS IN COUNTRIES OF WAR.

Mr. LEWIS. I submit a resolution and ask that it be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 140) was read, as follows:

Whereas in the various countries now engaged in war there are 4,000,000 Lithuanians, the great majority of whom are destitute of food, shelter, and clothing; and

Whereas millions of them have been driven from their homes without warning, deprived of an opportunity to make provision for their most elementary wants, causing starvation, disease, and untold suffering; and

Whereas the people of the United States of America have learned with sorrow of this plight of millions of human beings and have most generously responded to the cry for help whenever such an opportunity has reached them: Therefore be it

Resolved, That in view of the misery, wretchedness, and hardships which these 4,000,000 Lithuanians are suffering, the President of the United States be respectfully asked to designate a day on which the citizens of this country may give expression to their sympathy by contributing to the funds now being raised for the relief of the Lithuanians in the war zone.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over and be printed.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY.

Mr. OWEN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 141), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized during the Sixty-fourth Congress to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a price not to exceed $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before the said committee; that the committee may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate; and the expense thereof shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee subsequently said: At the request of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], who is anxious to have a hearing before the Committee on Banking and Currency this afternoon, I report back favorably from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate the resolution submitted by him to-day, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. OWEN. I desire to give notice of a proposed amendment to the standing rules of the Senate, which I ask may be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the standing rules of the Senate be, and they hereby are, amended as follows:

At the close of Rule XXII add:

"Provided, however, That when any 10 Senators, in writing, move that the debate should be brought to a close, the Chair shall, without permitting any debate thereon, put the question to the Senate—

"'Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate should be brought to a close?'

"And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative by a two-thirds vote of those voting, then the pending question, bill, or resolution shall be in order to the exclusion of all other questions and business. And thereafter, the motion being so carried, no Senator shall be entitled to speak more than one hour in all on the question, bill, or resolution, or amendments thereto, or on any motion affecting the same.

"No dilatory motion shall be in order, and it shall be the duty of the presiding officer to declare such motion out of order when the question of order is raised by a Senator, or to immediately submit the question without debate to the Senate."

MILITARY TRAINING IN CIVIL LIFE.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to call up the resolution of inquiry which I offered several days ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from Massachusetts, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 139), which had been submitted by Mr. LODGE on the 20th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate a statement, to be prepared by The Adjutant General of the Army, showing approximately the number of persons in the United States in civil life who have received a military training within the last 10 years, as follows:

First. Men who have served at least one full enlistment in the Regular Army.

Second. Men who have served at last one full enlistment in the National Guard.

Third. Graduates of educational institutions which provide an adequate military training.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

INCREASE IN NUMBER OF CADETS AT WEST POINT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further concurrent or other resolutions? If there be none, morning business is closed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill which is known as the Military Academy bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4876) to provide for an increase in the number of cadets at the United States Military Academy.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the pending amendment is an amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and I should like to have the Secretary state it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. The amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is: On page 2, in section 2, line 14, where the word "one" occurs, being the second word in the line, it is proposed to insert "five," so that it will read—

At the rate of five for each regiment.

On line 17, where the words "one representative" occur, it is proposed to strike them out and to insert in lieu thereof "five representatives," so that it will read:

Hereby increased to the number necessary to provide for maintaining hereafter five representatives or each organization as herein prescribed.

And after the word "prescribed," at the end of the section, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, however, That the number of cadets at the United States Military Academy thus selected by the President from enlisted men in the Army and the National Guard shall not at any time exceed 300.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to perfect the amendment by changing its language, and I think the best way to do it is to move the whole amendment in the form of a substitute or new amendment.

After the word "Army," in the eighth line, I move to insert "and the National Guard"; after the word "prescribe," in the eleventh line, I move to strike out all the remainder of the section and to insert:

Provided, That the total number so selected shall not exceed 300 in any one year.

So that the section as proposed to be amended will read:

The President is hereby authorized to appoint cadets to the United States Military Academy from among the enlisted men of the Regular Army and the National Guard, between the ages of 19 and 22, who have served as enlisted men not less than one year, to be selected under such regulations as the President may prescribe: Provided, That the total number so selected shall not exceed 300 in any one year.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; that can not be right. The Senator from Missouri is now providing for any one year. It means at any one time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is the total of 300.

Mr. JAMES. The number selected.

Mr. WARREN. Most assuredly; it must be not over 300 at any one time.

Mr. REED. Not over 300 at any one time. That is right.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am sure that is the way it would be construed in any event, because the last section of the bill provides that the cadets shall be admitted by increments.

I desire to state, very briefly, that this proposed amendment is much preferable to the original amendment as it was under consideration the other day in the Senate.

I have no particular objection to the plan for the admission to West Point of enlisted men in the National Guard and the Regular Army. As I said the other day, I feel that it would strengthen the Army and strengthen West Point, for that matter, if all the cadets of the Academy could be appointed from the enlisted strength of the Army and National Guard after serving a term of one year's enlistment; but I feel that the proposal as now made may defeat the very purpose the committee had in view, which was to recognize the enlisted strength.

In addition to that, in order that the matter may be in the RECORD and that Senators may know just what will be the effect of the adoption of this amendment, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the number of cadets provided for under the law as it stands to-day. I did not make the statement the other day, but I desire to make it now.

The present law provides for cadets as follows: One for each congressional district, making 435; 1 for each Territory, making 2; 1 for Porto Rico; 2 from each State at large, making 96; 2 for the District of Columbia; and 40 by the President at large, making 576 in all.

In 1915 an act was passed which provided that successors to cadets might be admitted to the academy at the end of three years of the course, instead of at the end of four years, as it had originally been. So that increased the authorized strength of the academy to 770 instead of 576.

That total authorized strength is usually reduced from 150 to 200 every year because of failure of the young men to pass the examinations required and because of dismissals from the academy for various reasons. So the authorized strength is always in excess of the cadets actually in attendance.

If we practically double the number, as this bill provides, under the Army as at present organized the strength of the Cadet Corps would be as follows: Doubling the present number of cadets from 435 congressional districts would make 870; doubling the Territorial appointments would make 4; then there would be 4 from the District of Columbia; 2 from Porto Rico; from the States at large—the senatorial appointments—192; presidential appointments 60, making 1,132 in all, which this bill would authorize to be appointed.

Now, Mr. President, if, as this bill provides, 1 should be appointed from each regiment of the enlisted strength, it would add 64 to those appointed from the congressional districts, from the States at large, and otherwise, which would make 1,196 cadets altogether, and that is practically all that the Military Academy will accommodate.

Mr. REED. Is that according to the present strength of the Army?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is according to the present strength of the Army. If the present reorganization bill that is pending in the Senate becomes the law, we would have to add to that the difference between the number of regiments under existing law, 64, and the number of regiments which the reorganization bill will provide, 136, which is 72; so that it would make the strength 1,204.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How will this last quota be appointed—by the President?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. By the President, under such rules and regulations as he might prescribe, from the enlisted strength of the Army.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. This plan does not propose to take away from Senators and Representatives the power which they now have to designate cadets?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Not at all.

Mr. LODGE. It increases it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It increases the number that are now permitted to be appointed by Members of Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. To what extent?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It doubles the number.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, as a matter of fact, Senators and Representatives have no right to appoint cadets.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; the President appoints them all.

Mr. JAMES. The President appoints them, but he recognizes the long-standing custom of allowing the appointments to be made upon the recommendation of Senators and Representatives.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator is correct about that; the President appoints them all, but it has become almost an unwritten law for the President to recognize the designations of Senators and Representatives, and their recommendations are practically adopted by the President.

Now, Mr. President, what I want to call attention to is that the bill as originally prepared provided for about 1,132 cadets in the academy—in round numbers, 1,200. I wish to read what Gen. Scott said about the capacity of the academy to accommodate an additional number to the present corps.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, before the Senator reads that, will he yield for a question?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Oregon suggests that of the quota of cadets now provided for the academy there are from 150 to 200 vacancies practically all the time, on account of failure to pass the examinations, and so forth. Suppose the limit on the number to be appointed from the enlisted strength of the Army should be placed at 200 instead of 300, so as to provide that 200 shall be named by the President from the privates in the Army or from the National Guard, does not the Senator think he could accept that?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It would probably——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We are very anxious not to oppose what the committee proposes, but quite a number of us are also very anxious to have a formal recognition by the President of men in the ranks of the Army and in the National Guard, in order that they may feel the stimulus of the prospect of designation by the President to West Point. I believe the friends of this measure, if the chairman of the committee could agree to a limit of 200, would be willing to reduce the number from 300 to 200.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I understand the section which is proposed to be amended by the Senator from Missouri provides for appointments from the National Guard and from the enlisted men of the Army.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It does. I am referring to the number of such appointments. The chairman of the committee is objecting to an increase beyond 60 or 90, but some of us are quite anxious to have at least as many more as it is possible to appoint from the ranks and from the National Guard; and if the Senator in charge of the bill thinks that 200 could be allowed—I have just spoken to the Senator from Missouri on the subject—I believe the advocates of this measure would modify it to 200, if that would meet the approval of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, so far as I am personally concerned, I have no objection to that increase. I really think it would be beneficial to the Army and to the National Guard to admit young men to the Military Academy from the ranks of the Army and from the National Guard, but the number proposed was too large, and it might be too large even with an increase of 200.

Now, I want to call attention to Gen. Scott's testimony before the committee, so that the Senate may understand just exactly what the condition will be.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before the Senator does that, and just for information, what would be the number added if we added one from each regiment under the new military bill, assuming it to go through?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is very difficult to estimate what the number would be.

Mr. REED. Can the Senator approximate it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think it would add about 136 from the Regular Army.

Mr. REED. Then, if the Senator were to accept the proposition made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] of a total of 200, which, of course, would cut out the one from each regiment, which would aggregate about 130, it would only make a difference of 70 men.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. About 70.

Mr. REED. And there are some advantages in taking them from the Army and the National Guard at large, instead of taking them one from each regiment, as the bill provides. Can not the Senator accept that one amendment and let us get on to the bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am willing to accept it, so far as I am concerned, to the extent of 200, but even that may possibly make more than the academy will accommodate. That is what I want to call attention to now.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Oregon whether this would not be a better arrangement: The original bill contemplated about 1,132 cadets. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri adds 300. I want to see the amendment of the Senator from Missouri prevail; that is, I want the cadets taken from that source; but why not deduct that number from the number who are to be appointed by the President from congressional districts and States? Then the total number will not be increased, and this further object will be served, which I pointed out the other day: There will be given to the enlisted men a better opportunity for promotion to commissioned rank without passing through West Point, inasmuch as the officers graduated at West Point have the first right of command.

I hope that for the two reasons the Senator from Oregon will look with favor upon keeping the number at 1,132, but appointing 300 of them, at least—and I should like to see more—from the ranks of the enlisted men in the Regular Army or in the National Guard.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that, under the suggestion which the Senator makes, it would not increase the number by 200, but would increase it by 200 less 136, assuming that Senate bill 4840 passed Congress as reported by the committee. That would only be 64. I am willing to accept that, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not understand that that was the proposal.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me tell the Senator: The amendment of the Senator from Missouri provides for the appointment of not to exceed 200. In my estimate of 1,132 there is not included the number that the bill provides for, of 1 from each regiment of the Regular Army, and the appointment would be the 200 in gross instead of figuring 1 from each regiment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I shall make no objection to that; but I still believe that the proposal to increase the Regular Army, and to secure a body of reserves, would be promoted if we would give the enlisted men a larger opportunity than they now have for entering the ranks of commissioned officers—men who can not pass the examination for West Point, men who are too old to be admitted to West Point.

I simply wanted to indicate my desire in that respect, for it is a point that will inevitably arise when we come to consider the general bill for the reorganization of the Army, which the Senator has in view.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. My opinion is that that would really imperil the opportunity to do anything, because there is great opposition to increasing the cadets from the enlisted strength, either of the guard or of the Army; so I think this tentative plan would work out all right, and possibly the policy might be enlarged a little later on. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to accept the proposition.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon a question. If the total number provided for is 1,132 by accepting this amendment, we will only add how many to that number?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Two hundred.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. So that in place of 1,100 it would be approximately 1,200?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. About 1,300.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the chairman of the Military Committee—with whom I shall vote on this bill, because I believe he has most carefully considered it—the possibility of arranging to give these young men who serve in the Army an opportunity to become officers by possibly greatly enlarging, in a way, the facilities for education which are now afforded at West Point.

The thought I had in my mind was that we could well afford to educate twice as many young men for military service as we have use for in the Regular Army and return possibly half of the graduates to civil life every year. My own opinion is that if we do that we will avoid any possibility of a military caste in this country, which a great many people fear. I do not fear it so much myself; but it seems to me that if at least half the young men who are graduated at our military academies are returned to civil life with a fine education the country will lose practically nothing and the young men will gain a great deal. By such a plan as that we might very greatly encourage the enlistment of young men in the Army for the sake of obtaining the education. I would not object, when they are retired to civil life, to paying them a bonus.

My suggestion as to how that may be done would be something of this character: That one of the Army posts which are not at present used might be selected for what might be called an auxiliary academy, or possibly for the education of young men in what are known as the third and fourth classes at West Point now. I do not know whether or not the suggestion is practicable; but I believe it contains an element of merit, in that you will not raise up any military caste in this country if you return to civil life from each graduating class as many young men as remain in the Regular Army.

I should be very glad, as I view it now, to vote for a provision of that kind; but I shall vote with the chairman of the committee on this matter.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think it would be well in considering this subject to know where we are at present, as to the sources from which we draw our Army commissioned force.

When the bill was up before I was asked what proportion of the commissioned officers of the Army were graduates of West Point, and I answered offhand that less than one-half of the present commissioned officers of the Army were graduates of West Point. I have before me now a report from The Adjutant General, which states that only 46 per cent of the present commissioned strength of the Army are graduates from West Point; that 10 per cent were raised directly from the ranks, plus all of the officers except two that are with the Philippine Scouts. They were all raised from the ranks. Forty-four per cent come from civil life. Appointments from civil life include those from the National Guard; and I take it for granted that Senators and Members of Congress, when they could do so, would do as I have done, and many others—select young men who are already in the National Guard. This 44 per cent takes boys from the schools, boys from the universities, especially boys from the military schools where Army officers are detailed to teach them, and in fact the deserving young men from all the ranks of life.

In the general reorganization bill, which we shall probably adopt, we enlarge the opening for men in the ranks, because now they must wait until West Point and the schools that are recognized as military schools are provided for before they can be considered. It is proposed that they shall stand next to West Point; that after the West Point graduates are provided for all those from Army ranks that have applied and that can pass the examination shall come from that source, so that we are already going in the direction of recognizing, to a greater extent than heretofore, the ranks of the Army. As to the National Guard, they should stand as well, of course; but they come in not only directly, because they are members of the National Guard, but they come in among the young men who are selected from the schools and from civil life.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read a telegram from Gen. O'Ryan, of the New York National Guard.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., March 20, 1916.

Hon. OLLIE JAMES, Washington, D. C.:

Your amendment to provide for appointment of cadets from National Guard regiments regarded here as most desirable. It will provide Federal Government with candidates from highest type of young men in the country and stimulate recruiting everywhere. This amendment is due the National Guard, which will be a Federal force after passage of present legislation.

JOHN F. O'RYAN, Major General.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, as I understand the parliamentary status of the bill at this time, the amendment I offered, providing that these cadets shall be selected from the enlisted men of the Army and the National Guard, was adopted on Saturday last, the words "and the National Guard" being substituted after the word "Army" where it appears in section 2 of the bill. I understand that the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Missouri, and accepted by the chairman of the committee, also provides that these enlisted men shall be selected from the Army and from the National Guard.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It does.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have not been able to follow the discussion on this bill fully; but, as I understand, some suggestion has been made with reference to the accommodations at the Academy in the event of the increase in the number of cadets is provided for.

Some weeks ago this matter was called to my attention by some friends who were interested in both military and naval matters, and at their suggestion I introduced Senate bill 4711, which was referred to the Military Affairs Committee. This bill, in substance, provides that after the appointment of cadets and midshipmen they shall both attend the same school during the first year of their studies, to be established by the War and Navy Departments. The school is to be located on the shores of the Great Lakes. The thought is that the course of study for the students at the Military Academy and at the Naval Academy is substantially the same, and that after the first year they could then proceed either to the Military Academy or to the Naval Academy to complete their studies, the completed course to extend over a period of four years, as now. As I understand, if there is a considerable increase either at West Point or at Annapolis, it will be necessary to have further accommodations, and these might as well be provided at some new institution.

I hope the committees will give that bill proper consideration, as I have no doubt they will.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the committee will give the matter consideration.

Two or three times in the course of what I had to say I intended to give the accommodations of the academy, but I was interrupted and led away from it. I am going to ask to have Gen. Scott's statement, which is very brief, published in connection with what I have to say.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, that may be done.

The matter referred to is as follows:

I believe that, temporarily at least, the corps can be increased to 1,150 or 1,200 cadets without new building construction by the following expedients:

1. By putting 3 men in each room, 1,038 cadets can be accommodated in the present barracks.

By building a temporary barracks of cantonment type, at a cost of about $25,000, this number can be increased to 1,200.

2. By sending the Corps of Cadets to their meals in two reliefs the present mess hall will answer the needs of the corps at a strength of 1,200.

3. By making use of temporary buildings of the cantonment type for the slightly sick, the present cadet hospital can be made to accommodate the sick if the corps is increased to 1,200.

4. By increasing the number of instructors to the limit of the capacity of the present quarters, and by increasing the amount of work done by each instructor, it is believed that items for officers' quarters, new roads, retaining walls, heating, lighting, etc., can be, for the present, dispensed with.

5. By increasing the number of hours work of the enlisted detachment at the academy, it is believed that the full amount of instruction can be given without the amounts asked for for stables, barracks, etc.

6. To make the necessary changes in the interior of the academic buildings to accommodate this increased number in the classrooms, to provide for temporary structures that may possibly be found necessary, to enlarge the camp ground, to provide arms and equipment for the new cadets, etc., it is probable that the sum of $260,000 will be necessary.

If the corps be increased to approximately 1,200, and the things done as I have suggested above, it will mean that the cadets and officers will not be so comfortably housed and cared for as at present, and that the work of the instructors will be very materially increased, but I believe that the work of the institution can still be conducted without lowering the present standards, and that the spirit which animated officers and men at the academy in former days, when the conveniences and plant were far inferior to what they are to-day, will not be found wanting, and that the results produced will be as good as they have ever been.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think it is of very much more importance that we should increase the number of cadets from the enlisted men and the National Guard than that we should increase them from appointments by Congressmen made from civil life. I hope the Senator from Oregon, the chairman of the committee, will see his way clear to accept the amendment originally offered by the Senator from Missouri. I would rather have 300 appointed from the service and have the number appointed by Congressmen from civil life reduced, if that is necessary on account of inadequate accommodations at the academy.

I wish the Senator from Oregon would give the Senate the information which once or twice, I think, he has started to give, and just as he was about to give it was interrupted and failed to give it, as to the number of cadets that can be accommodated at the academy now.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, Gen. Scott says that by crowding the academy somewhat the academy can be made to accommodate about 1,200.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood the Senator to say a little while ago that with the additions proposed in his bill, and with 200 more added as proposed in the last amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, the number would be 1,200.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; something like that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Something around 1,200. Now, the Senator says that the academy will accommodate 1,200; but the Senator has made another statement, which, I think, should be taken into consideration in this connection. The Senator said that at present, with an authorized number of about 770, on account of resignations, dismissals, failures to pass examinations, and so on, you might knock off about 150 annually, I think, from that number.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. On February 1 last there were 585 in the academy.

Mr. SIMMONS. If there were 585 and 770 were authorized, if you authorize 1,200 you must add to that list the number who will not attend, or who, if they should succeed in passing their examinations, may have to resign; so that instead of 150 falling out on account of their failure to pass the examinations, if you increased the number to 1,200 you would probably have at least 250 falling out for the same reasons. If you should deduct that number from the 1,200 which the Senator said the academy can now accommodate you would have less than 1,000 appointees to the academy.

If I am correct about this—I do not know whether I am or not, but it seems to me that that is a natural conclusion—it does not seem to me that there is very much force in the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon that there are not now sufficient facilities to accommodate 300 more men in addition to the number provided in his bill.

I should like to ask the Senator if I am correct about that. The Senator from Oregon said the academy would accommodate 1,200, and, with the 200 in addition, the number provided, the number at the academy would be 1,200.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Of course, the larger the number authorized to be admitted, under the statement I have made, the greater the number in proportion who would not get in because of failures or dismissals. In other words, with an authorized strength of 770 only 585 are there now, a difference of 185. If we increase the number to 1,200 probably the deficiencies would be a little more than 185, increasing, of course, as the number authorized increases.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is apparent from that statement that from the authorized number you might deduct at least 200.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think it is wrong to estimate on that basis, because you might get the whole 1,200 in. There is no assurance that they will not pass the examination. Besides, if there were deficiencies and the President is authorized to appoint where they fail we may still keep the quota up to 1,200.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator from North Carolina has an erroneous impression.

Mr. SIMMONS. Probably I have. I am trying to get the matter straight.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the figures are about as follows: There are, as I recall, 435 Members of the House and 96 Senators, making a total of 531. Multiplied by 2 it would be 1,062. Sixty the President appoints from civil life. Eleven hundred and twenty-two added to 200 would be 1,322, and now the academy has a possible capacity of 1,200.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator has made no deduction. The Senator from Oregon said——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am coming to that. The President is given power to appoint 200 from the Army and the guardsmen. The total that might be appointed to the academy from all sources would be 1,322. The academy has a capacity of 1,200. Therefore there will be a margin of 122 to allow for vacancies, which seems to me to be reasonable.

Mr. President, it seems to me that discussion is rather unnecessary from the fact that this is only an authority to the President to appoint 200, and he may not exercise that authority if he finds the academy already crowded. There is enough elasticity there.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not believe in the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri adding 300. The probabilities are that with that number the academy would be overcrowded; but I think it is much to be regretted that we can not make the increase in the force at the academy, especially that part of it which will be selected from the enlisted men and from the National Guard, as large as the sentiment of the Senate seems to think it ought to be in the interest of the public because of lack of accommodations at the Military Academy. I think if that is the only trouble in the way the remedy is clearly to increase the accommodations at the academy, and we ought to have legislation right now. It is emergency legislation, and we ought to have legislation right now to increase the accommodations and not present to the country a situation where we can not do what we think the public interest of the country requires because there is a lack of quarters to accommodate the cadets at the Military Academy.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I rise to indorse what the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has just said. This body ought not to oppose this proposition because of lack of accommodations at either the Military or Naval Academies. Modern war is largely a war of brain, and if this Nation is going into a line of preparedness for defense there is more need for trained officers than any other one thing in either the Army or Navy. If there are inadequate accommodations at the Military Academy or the Naval Academy it is the first duty of Congress to prepare ample accommodations for educating its officers.

I want to indorse at the same time the suggestion made by my colleague [Mr. POMERENE], who has introduced a measure for the establishment of a school which will educate the students intended for the Naval Academy and the Military Academy at the same time during the first year of their studies. I think that is a highly practical thing to do, and I believe it is important for the Senate to consider at once the enlargement of the facilities of these educational institutions.

I for one, Mr. President, wish to vote not only for the measure now pending but to immediately follow it with such steps as are necessary to make ample accommodations for these students.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I am in sympathy with the bill which is now before the Senate in the form in which it seems to meet with general approval. My only thought is possibly that the number might be increased somewhat over 200 because very many of the young men who are going to be appointed by the President from the Army or the National Guard will not be qualified to pass the entrance examination. So inevitably, in my opinion, there will be a very considerable number of vacancies.

I was going to suggest to the chairman of the committee that a compromise be made between 200 and 300 and to make the number provided for 250.

My desire, Mr. President, is that as many officers of the Army as possible shall be educated at West Point. Other things being equal, it is desirable that that shall be done.

As the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] has just said, the wars of the present and future are and will be wars of brain, and you can get better trained brain through a specified course at our Military Academy for that purpose than in any other way.

There are two sides to the question of appointing young men from the Army and National Guard, however. A very considerable number will enlist in those organizations for that reason, and when they do not get the appointment or do not succeed in passing the examination they will lose their interest and will necessarily as a result be discharged.

Furthermore, I am not influenced in my advocacy of these appointments by the idea that it will give a democratic character to those who go into the Army, because to-day the character of the appointments to West Point represent more generally the occupations of the people of the country than do the students at any of our universities.

Between 1842 and 1899 the appointees or the parents of appointees at West Point represented 148 different occupations and professions. There were 4,887 such appointments, and of those 4,887, 128 were the sons of clergymen; 1,149 were the sons of farmers, substantially one-fourth of the appointees were sons of farmers; 645 were the sons of lawyers; 341 were the sons of mechanics; 367 were the sons of physicians; 362 were the sons of officers of the Army; and 722 were the sons of merchants of various degrees. As I have said, there were sons of parents in 148 different occupations.

That information was carefully prepared at the time of the hundredth anniversary of the founding of West Point, and I think it will be of interest to the Senate, and therefore I ask unanimous consent that it be included in my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Summary showing occupations, and number engaged in each, of parents of candidates for admission to the Military Academy, 1842 to 1891, and of parents of cadets admitted to the academy, 1892 to 1899, inclusive.

Mr. WEEKS. Now, considering the fact that there is a probability that a very considerable number of these young men will not pass their examinations, without offering an amendment I suggest to the chairman of the committee that the number provided for under this provision of the law be made 250.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the chairman of the committee will accept that modification.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I have given my reasons as strongly as I can for not wanting to increase the number beyond the limit the academy can accommodate, and I do not think it will be safe to increase it beyond the 200 limit. I think probably that stretches it somewhat.

Now, in order that Senators may understand that this is not my statement about it, I am going to insist upon reading Gen. Scott's statement, and I ask that I be not interrupted, because I have attempted two or three times to read it.

Mr. WARREN. Before starting to read it let me state that Gen. Scott was an able superintendent of the academy for a number of years and that he speaks with entire knowledge of the subject.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. As the Senator from Wyoming says, Gen. Scott was superintendent of the academy for a number of years and is now Chief of Staff of the Army and has been Acting Secretary of War. So I think he knows what he is talking about.

The superintendent of the academy says that to maintain 1,200 young men in the academy it will cost over $3,074,079. That is his estimate. That, I assume, is made up on the basis of the present luxurious quarters that the cadets have. Now, Gen. Scott, taking the figures of the superintendent of the academy, makes this statement:

In connection with the above estimate I believe that, temporarily at least, the corps can be increased to 1,150 or 1,200 cadets without new building construction by the following expedients.

The superintendent's estimate of cost, I think, was based upon the construction of new buildings. The general says:

1. By putting 3 men in each room 1,038 cadets can be accommodated in the present barracks.

By building a temporary barracks of cantonment type, at a cost of about $25,000, this number can be increased to 1,200.

So that to accommodate 1,200 you have got to expend $25,000 in a cheap type of structure.

2. By sending the Corps of Cadets to their meals in two reliefs the present mess hall will answer the needs of the corps at a strength of 1,200.

So that 1,200 will require the cadets to attend mess in two shifts.

3. By making use of temporary buildings of the cantonment type for the slightly sick, the present cadet hospital can be made to accommodate the sick if the corps is increased to 1,200.

4. By increasing the number of instructors to the limit of the capacity of the present quarters and by increasing the amount of work done by each instructor it is believed that items for officers' quarters, new roads, retaining walls, heating, lighting, etc., can be, for the present, dispensed with.

5. By increasing the number of hours' work of the enlisted detachment at the academy it is believed that the full amount of instruction can be given without the amounts asked for for stables, barracks, etc.

6. To make the necessary changes in the interior of the academic buildings to accommodate this increased number in the classrooms, to provide for temporary structures that may possibly be found necessary, to enlarge the camp ground, to provide arms and equipment for the new cadets, etc., it is probable that the sum of $260,000 will be necessary.

If the corps be increased to approximately 1,200, and the things done as I have suggested above, it will mean that the cadets and officers will not be so comfortably housed and cared for as at present, and that the work of the instructors will be very materially increased, but I believe that the work of the institution can still be conducted without lowering the present standards and that the spirit which animated officers and men at the academy in former days, when the conveniences and plant were far inferior to what they are to-day, will not be found wanting and that the results produced will be as good as they have ever been.

Mr. President, I think we have gone the limit when we increase by 200 from the enlisted strength of the Army and the National Guard.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not want to prolong this debate. I hope the amendment as it is now framed making a very modest increase of 200 from the enlisted men of the Army and the National Guard will be passed. I feel very sure that when this bill gets into conference it is quite likely that a further increase will be made.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator let me interrupt him for a minute? How could there be an increase from the larger number?

Mr. REED. That may be true, but any way it may be taken care of later. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] suggests to me that it would give us a good start.

But it seems to me the objection that the quarters at West Point are not large enough to accommodate more than a certain number of men, if we are to limit our military to the size of the present buildings at West Point, is not a sound position to take. Beyond any question we will have to put up more buildings, not only at our Military Academy but the increase of the Army involves the increase of quarters for soldiers. It involves an increase all along the line, and we ought not to put a limit upon the officers of the Army simply because it is necessary to construct a new building. That is putting a limit for a reason that is so trivial and inconsequential that it is not worthy of serious consideration.

But I recognize the fact that all measures of legislation are compromises. While I do not think the increase to 200 is nearly as large as it ought to be, I think we ought to agree on it and let it go through at that and let the future take care of the additional number.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the bill. I presume it will be an additional section. At any rate I offer it for insertion at the proper place.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whenever after the regular annual examinations there shall still be vacancies in the number of cadets authorized by law to be appointed to the West Point Military Academy, such vacancies may be filled by appointment on the part of the President, such appointments to be made from the senior classmen and graduates of those colleges to which officers of the Regular Army are now detailed as military instructors by the Secretary of War, the eligibility of such persons to be ascertained under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will merely say that I heartily indorse the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], to which the Senate has just agreed.

I think that everything possible ought to be done to democratize the Army, especially to democratize officers of the Army. This is essential to the improvement of the Army and is essential to the protection of the country against the growing evil of militarism.

For my own part I wish the present system of senatorial and congressional appointments of cadets might be abolished. The truth is it is no system at all. The selections are made without any reference to military aptitude or to military fitness. There are to-day 100 educational institutions to which the Government of the United States details officers of the Regular Army as military instructors. There assemble annually in these hundred institutions 30,000 American youths. We have a right to assume that the military instinct, the military talent, and genius of this country gravitate toward these institutions where military instruction is available. The doors of West Point ought to stand ajar before the eyes of every one of these 30,000 youths, not merely for the benefit which it would bring to those who were successful in passing from these institutions to the Military Academy, but for the sake of the benefit that would inure to those who aspire to go to West Point, but who are unsuccessful in their efforts and their aspirations.

This would establish a system of natural selection, under which the Government could avail itself of the military talent and the military genius of the country. This is a most desirable object to be attained. It is not attained under the present system. According to the statement of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], there are constantly vacancies of 180 or 190 in the West Point Military Academy. That is an enormous waste. That is a most expensive establishment. The quota ought to be filled at all times; the waste ought to be eliminated; the Government ought to realize the benefits which can come to it from keeping the quota constantly filled in that institution.

The amendment which I have proposed would not become operative until all the present systems had failed to supply the full quota. When they had failed the vacancies still remaining could be filled by the President by appointment or selection from the 100 institutions where military instruction is now available. That would afford an open door. The inducements, the stimulation to ambition, the possibilities of promotion would stand constantly in the eyes of every ambitious youth and every military genius in every one of these hundred institutions. I have no doubt the amendment ought to be adopted, and that it would contribute much to military efficiency in this country in the future. Of course, I hardly anticipate the adoption of the amendment at this time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma will not be adopted. It seems to me we have sufficiently broadened the opportunity for young men to enter the Military Academy under the bill as it stands at present.

Further than that, Mr. President, when the Army reorganization bill comes up for consideration the Senator from Oklahoma will find that that bill has still further opened the opportunity for young men to prepare themselves for military life if they see fit to do so. We are including in it what is known here as the Pomerene bill, which applies to all of these educational institutions and provides for the training of officers from the schools which have military officers to train their students. So I think this bill ought to stand as it is, without further amendment, and that we should take up the subject for consideration when the reorganization bill is before the Senate.

Mr. GORE. Does the Senator from Oregon think there would be any possibility of adding to the Pomerene bill the opportunity to the boys who graduate from these institutions where military instruction is available to pass from those institutions, by reason of demonstrated military merit, to the West Point Academy?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] showed here a while ago that more than half of the commissioned strength of the Army comes from, if I may so speak, the humbler walks of life; it comes from the citizenry. Those officers are not graduates of any military academy, but they are taken from the enlisted strength and from civil life.

Further than that, the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] shows the class of people from whom the selections are made. The fact is it opens the door to everybody in this country who wants to get there. The only question for the consideration of the Senate is that of increasing the number of admissions. We have sought to do that, and I do not think we ought to broaden it.

Mr. GORE. I will suggest to the Senator from Oregon that the amendment does not propose any increase whatever. It simply seeks to avoid 100, 200, or 300 vacancies in this expensive educational institution. It seeks to fill those vacancies, and to keep them filled, and it would not be operative until all the other methods of selection had failed to supply the full quota.

Mr. CATRON. Mr. President, the proposition submitted by the Senator from Oklahoma will do no good at all. The law already provides for filling the vacancies. When a vacancy occurs, that vacancy is to last until the next year; you can not fill it immediately, and the Member of Congress who has appointed a cadet who has failed to pass the examination has the right to fill the vacancy the next year. The only effect of this amendment would be to cut away from the Member of Congress the right to recommend the filling of the vacancy which had occurred in his previous appointment. It would not add a single number or fill up a single vacancy any quicker than it otherwise would be filled.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in after the word "appointed," in line 1, on page 2.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 1, after the word "appointed," it is proposed to insert:

> Such appointments shall be made without regard to the political qualifications of the applicants, and the President is hereby authorized to provide, by rules and regulations, either through the Civil Service Commission or otherwise, for competitive examinations of applicants.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have been moved to offer this amendment by the expression of various Senators to the effect that they thought it was desirable that the selection of appointees to West Point on behalf of Congressmen should be discarded, and that such appointments should be made without reference to the Senators and Members of the other House from the various States and Districts.

If I am correct, the law itself does not provide that appointees to Annapolis and West Point shall be made by Members of Congress. If I am wrong about that, I should be very glad to have the Senator from Oregon, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, correct me.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that while such appointments are technically made by the President, they are really made by him on the recommendation of Members of Congress, though the absolute right of appointment is his.

Mr. NORRIS. Again, I should like to be corrected if my statement is wrong, that there is not any absolute right, as I understand, under the law, for a Senator or a Member of the House of Representatives to appoint anyone to West Point or to Annapolis. As I understand, it is a custom that has grown up, which has been in practice a great many years. I have heard quite a number of Senators to-day, and the other day when we had this bill under consideration, express the idea that the custom was not a good one—at least, that it was not the best one. I think it has worked fairly well, and I am not making any particular criticism with regard to it; but, it seems to me, if this courtesy, which has been extended through a great many years to such an extent that it is spoken of here now as a right, should be taken away and such appointments be made without regard to the wishes of Members of Congress, the system would be greatly improved.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to say very briefly, in answer to the Senator from Nebraska, that I do not think it is at all necessary in any legislation of this kind to refer to the question of a man's politics. I do not believe there is a Senator here who knows the politics of any young man whom he has recommended for appointment to the Military Academy during his term in the Senate. I have appointed quite a number, and I declare that I do not know the politics of a single young man whom I have appointed, nor do I know the politics of the fathers of such young men.

Further than that, Mr. President, I have gone to this extent in my State, with, however, not very favorable results: I have opened the door to every young man in the State by having the university of the State examine the young men for admission, and I have given the appointment to the young man who stood the best examination, but that practice has not worked out well. The fact is that these young men need some special preparation. While they may pass a splendid examination at the hands of the faculty of the university of the State, they do not seem to come up to the standards of the requirements of the academy. So I believe, leaving it as it is now, allowing Senators and Representatives to appoint bright, active young men who they think may be admitted, we will get a very much better result than any other system that could be adopted.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, in the matter of these appointments, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the fact that it is very valuable and necessary that all parts of the country should be represented. The ideal way probably would be to have general competition all over the country and that the men who have the highest marks should be admitted. That is the way they do in France, at the Polytechnique School; but obviously this country is so large and the conditions are so different, educationally and otherwise, that such a system would result in an undue proportion of cadets, both at the Military and Naval Academies, from certain parts of the country where they have exceptional educational advantages. Therefore it has been the custom from the very foundation of these national schools to apportion the students to all the different parts of the country, which is best done by congressional districts and by States.

It is evident that, if these appointments were left to the President, he would have great difficulty in making his selections. The Members of the House and Senate from the respective districts and States are better qualified to judge and to select young men; and I must say that I entirely agree with the Senator from Oregon in his view that the appointments are rarely, if ever, made solely for political considerations. I know that I have never made an appointment to West Point nor to the Naval Academy on those grounds since I have been in the Senate. I believe, as a matter of fact, that a number of appointments I have made have been of young men who were Democrats, although I did not know their politics at the time. However, that is not the point. The point is that the Senator or Representative, in my judgment, should select the best and most capable young man in his district or State and give him the chance. That is best for the State, best for the country, and fair to all. I can see no advantage whatever to be gained by the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will ask that the amendment be again stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 1, after the word "appointed," it is proposed to insert:

Such appointments shall be made without regard to the political qualifications of the applicant, and the President is hereby authorized to provide, by rules and regulations, either through the Civil Service Commission or otherwise, for competitive examinations of applicants.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the argument made by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], whose opinion, especially on military affairs, is entitled to very great weight, does not apply in this case, because this amendment does not change the provisions of the bill which require these appointments to be made from the congressional districts. That part of the bill is left exactly as it is now. With this amendment or without it, the appointments will have to be made from the various congressional districts and from the States at large, as is provided in the bill. There is no attempt to amend that.

The Senator says that it would be difficult for the President to make these appointments and distribute them over the country. That is true; and yet the bill provides that the President shall make the appointments. There is not anything in the law which gives the Senator from Delaware the right to appoint a man to the Military Academy. If it is true, as the Senator from Oregon says, that the appointments can better be made by the Representatives and the Senators, then why not provide in the law that the appointments shall be made by the Representatives and by the Senators and not by the President?

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JAMES. The appointments made by the President, as I understand, are all made after competitive examination. The 200 cadets whom it is proposed the President shall appoint to the Military Academy would be selected by him upon competitive examination from the enlisted men of the Army and from the National Guard, as he now selects cadets to the academy under the appointments which he makes. They are required to stand an examination, and if more pass the examination than there are appointments allotted to him, the President selects the ones he desires to appoint, giving the preference to those having the best grade.

Mr. NORRIS. This amendment, I will say to the Senator, does not change that.

Mr. JAMES. I was merely pointing out to the Senator that this amendment, of course, does apply to those appointments made by the President.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; they are all made by the President; that is true.

Mr. JAMES. I understand they are all made by the President; but 200 appointments will be made directly by the President without regard to the recommendation of Senators or Representatives. I was merely pointing out to the Senator that the President would make the 200 appointments, as he suggests.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. There is another suggestion I should like to make to the Senator. It is rather difficult to get a young man to take this examination who is able to stand it. He has to go to very considerable expense to prepare himself; he has to go to school and also equip himself. It takes an extraordinarily splendid education to stand this very hard examination. If you put it under the civil service, as the Senator suggests, there will be very few young men who would go to the trouble and expense of taking the examination if there was but little hope of being appointed, even if they passed it; in other words, there are very few young men who would go to school and equip themselves in the particular branches required to pass the examination without a hope that they would be appointed, more than would be given if they merely had to take their chances in a competitive examination.

Mr. NORRIS. Why, Mr. President, there is not anything in this amendment which compels the President to avail himself of the services of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator——

Mr. NORRIS. Let me first answer the Senator from Kentucky, and then I will be glad to yield to the Senator from Georgia. The amendment which I propose does not require the President to do anything of the kind suggested. He makes his own regulations. The amendment would have the same effect, so far as that is concerned, and I would have no objection if the words "through the Civil Service Commission" were stricken out. The cadets will be appointed by the President under such regulations as he may make. It will give him full and complete authority; in other words, it does, as affecting the selection of the 200 cadets, just what the Senator from Kentucky has said the President now does, except that it applies the same rule to all the districts, and he must appoint them, of course, from the districts and from the States as the law provides.

I agree with the Senator from Kentucky that a young man does not want to, and often can not afford to, go to school and make special preparation for an examination, unless he has a pretty good assurance that he is going to be appointed. This amendment would not affect that. That same objection applies now. I know that when I have had a good many applications for appointments to Annapolis or to West Point I have called on the Civil Service Commission to hold an examination for me. They have held them, and I have borne the expense of it, and it has worked very satisfactorily; and I agreed in advance to appoint those who should pass the best examination.

The President could do that, if he wanted to, under this amendment, but there is nothing that compels him to do that. He can make any rule or regulation that he sees fit to make. I want the President to have all that authority. I am not seeking to take anything away from him. This amendment, for practical purposes, if it becomes a law, will give him more authority than he has now, because if this amendment were adopted he would not call on Senators and Members of the House of Representatives to nominate men to Annapolis and to West Point.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, the President really has the authority to do that now, if he so desires.

Mr. NORRIS. I know he does. I admit that.

Mr. JAMES. The recommendation of a Senator or of a Member of Congress is only advisory to the President.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that.

Mr. JAMES. The President, if he desires, may make such regulations and rules as he thinks wise.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but this is what would happen to any President who wanted to do it: We have already heard it said in this debate, "Why, the President appoints these men, but it is the right of the Member of Congress to make the selection." It is regarded here as a right. It is regarded in the House of Representatives as a right, because it is a custom that has been in vogue so many, many years. I believe that if at present the President were to take the course outlined in this amendment he would be criticized very greatly by Members of Congress, many of whom, I presume, would believe that it was the law—I confess that I did until recently—that a Member of Congress had a right to make such an appointment. Yet there has never been any right. It has been nothing but a courtesy.

Members have been discussing the matter here, on the two occasions when we have had this question up, of Members of Congress making these appointments; and they have universally expressed the opinion that it would be better, both for the Member of Congress and for the academy, if they did not make those appointments.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The objection I have to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska is that there is an implication that politics heretofore has cut some little figure in the selection of these applicants. Now, of course, that is not the case and has not been the case.

Mr. NORRIS. That has been the case a good many times.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Well, very rarely; and I will suggest to the Senator that if the appointees have any politics when they are appointed, after they get there it soon dies.

Mr. NORRIS. I believe that is true; but it does not help the poor fellow back home who wants to be appointed but who has not any political influence behind him.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The power which the Senator proposes to give the President by this amendment he has already and he has it inherently. He could prescribe any rules and regulations that he might see fit for the selection of these candidates, or for the nomination of them. He could prescribe rules. He could consult Congress, Representatives and Senators. He could call upon the Civil Service Commission if he saw fit. The law gives him the power. I do not see that this amendment will confer upon the President any right or authority which he does not already possess. The suggestion that politics has influenced the appointments to West Point, I think, is not justified by the facts of history.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to say, in reply to what the Senator has said—and the suggestion has also been made by other Senators—that politics does not enter into these appointments, that I believe it is getting less and less all the time, and there is less politics in it; but, Mr. President, there have often and often been appointments made when the political factor was the determining feature in making the appointment. I know of those instances. I remember that when I was a boy I wanted to go to West Point, and the teacher who had charge of the school I was attending thought—in fact, he made the suggestion to me—that I might be able to get into it, and there was even a competitive examination held; but I found out, or he did in looking it up for me, that it was useless for me to apply, because of politics.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, the Senator's mentioning that fact but adds proof to my mind that it ought not to cut any figure, because if that had been the rule the American people and the United States Senate might have been deprived of the great service the Senator has rendered and is rendering here, and he probably would not have made as great a soldier as he has a Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. It might be that you spoiled a good soldier to make a poor Senator, but that does not make any difference. The fact is there just the same.

I have not offered this amendment in a spirit of criticism. I do not believe there is very much politics in any of the appointments that are made to either one of those places now, but there is some yet. If this amendment were adopted it would be eliminated, I think. It would be eliminated if that clause were taken out of it, I think. To satisfy the sensitive nature of some of the Senators who do not want to have that apply, I am going to modify the amendment by striking out the first sentence—the words "such appointments shall be made without regard to the political qualifications of the applicants, and." Then it will read:

The President is hereby authorized—

And so forth.

I suppose somebody will criticize that now because they will say he might make political appointments under that language; but I hope they will not. It reads in this way now:

The President is hereby authorized to provide, by rules and regulation, either through the Civil Service Commission or otherwise, for competitive examination of applicants.

Mr. STONE. Let us have a vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section:

No person who has reached the age of 20 years shall be appointed as a cadet at the United States Military Academy, and no person shall be commissioned from civil life as a line officer in the Army unless such person has served at least one year, with a good record, as an enlisted man in the Army or the National Guard, or has been a student, with a good scholastic and military record, for at least two years at some military school or school where military instruction is given, approved for this purpose by the Secretary of War.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, the object of this amendment is to make service of some kind the basis of appointment from civil life. That is the main object of it. Service either in the National Guard, or service in the Regular Army, or experience at some military school for at least two years, is the prerequisite under this amendment for appointment from civil life to any person and to all persons.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Certainly.

Mr. DU PONT. May I inquire whether the Senator from Maryland is talking about appointments to the Military Academy, which is the question under discussion, or appointments to the Regular Army?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I am talking about both—appointments to the academy after 20 years of age and as line officers in the Army. This limits the appointments as line officers in the Army to persons who have had experience in the National Guard or in the Regular Army or at a military school—the latter for two years and the first two for one year—and also limits the power of appointment to West Point of persons over 20 years of age to persons who have had the same experience. They must have served either in the Army or in the National Guard, or must have been to a military school for two years. Under 20 they can be appointed to West Point as they now are; but under 20 presumably they have not had an opportunity for two years at a military school or to serve in the National Guard or to serve in the Army. I propose to leave the power of appointment to West Point under 20 as it is, to leave the wide scope of appointment open there; but the object of this amendment is, as far as reasonable, to make military service, military experience, somebody passing on the military character of the man, a basis for appointment as a line officer from civil life to the United States Army or to the Military Academy for a person over 20 years of age.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I desire to offer the following amendment: On page 2, line 11, strike out the words "twenty-two" and substitute therefor the words "twenty-five."

As the section now reads, as amended, the President is authorized to appoint cadets to the United States Military Academy from the enlisted men of the Regular Army or the National Guard between the ages of 19 and 22 years. The purpose of my amendment is to change that period so that he may appoint them between the ages of 19 and 25 years. My reason for offering the amendment is as follows:

We have just started out to do something for the National Guard and to offer some encouragement to the young men, the enlisted men of the Regular Army; and yet it is quite possible that on account of the character of the legislation by which we desire to do this nobody in the National Guard or in the Regular Army, or at least very few of those we desire to benefit, will have an opportunity to take advantage of this legislation. The legal age of enlisted men in the Regular Army is 21. The legal age of enlisted men in the National Guard is 21. This legislation provides that in addition a man must serve a year in either of the organizations. Therefore if he enlists at the legal age of 21 and serves a year he is 22, and becomes ineligible to appointment under this bill by the very terms of the measure itself.

Of course it is true that a great many men get into the Regular Army before they are 21 and a great many men get into the National Guard before they are 21; but no young man under the age of 21 living with his parents can, without their consent, enter either of these organizations.

I agree that the age limit should not be increased so far as the other classes are concerned. It perhaps would be a good thing to decrease the age limit; but certainly in this restricted class, where we can not hope to get very many men under the most favorable circumstances, it would be cruel to dangle this promise before their eyes when practically by our own language and in our own legislation we defeat their hope, and make it impossible for them to derive the benefits we would all like to see them derive from this legislation.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I hope that amendment will not be adopted. If a man is admitted to the Naval Academy at 25 years of age, and remains there four years, he is getting pretty well along in years by the time he has fitted himself for the service. I think the limit is broad enough now.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, quite; too old, if anything.

Mr. HUGHES. I hope the Senators understand the situation here. I asked the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee what the average age of enlistment was.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I inquired at the War Department since the Senator propounded that question to me, and they told me they could not tell just what it was.

Mr. HUGHES. I have also inquired from the War Department; but there is not the slightest doubt in my mind but that the average age of enlistment is over 21. What is the object of attempting to send men to the Military Academy at all if you are going to frame your legislation so that it can not be done? Why not abandon this idle pretense?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator that in my own State I have probably a dozen applications for appointment to the academy. I can not appoint them all; but under this bill the parents of those young men would say: "Here, there is a chance for you to get in there now. Enlist for a year, and you will be only 18 or 19 years old when you have completed your one year of enlistment, and you will have an opportunity then to be appointed." The very purpose of it was to stimulate an interest on the part of young men, and to get them to serve a year of enlistment.

Mr. HUGHES. That is very praiseworthy, of course, but it fails to take into account men who have already enlisted without that stimulus—men who have already been patriotic enough or have felt that they had sufficient aptitude for the military service to enter that service.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President——

Mr. HUGHES. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. DU PONT. I appreciate the interest which the Senator from New Jersey takes in the enlisted men of the Army who would be benefited by this bill; but at the same time, desirable as it is to promote their interests in every proper way, it seems to me that if we are to do our duty here we should take some account as well of the interests of the Government.

Mr. HUGHES. Would not the Senator just as soon make his speech on this amendment after I have finished? I thought the Senator desired to ask me a question.

Mr. DU PONT. I will be through in one second. The provision as to age is designed to prevent the soldiers being too old, and for this reason not well adapted to become an officer. A civilian is not permitted to enter the Army if he is over 27, and this amendment practically sets this maximum aside.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator is mistaken about that. They will enlist a man older than 27, I think.

Mr. DU PONT. I refer to a civilian appointee, to be examined for a commission.

Mr. HUGHES. Oh, yes.

Mr. DU PONT. He can not be older than 27. That is the maximum age. The Senator's provision would allow a man to come in there at 29.

Mr. HUGHES. Twenty-eight, perhaps, or 29; yes.

Mr. DU PONT. Twenty-eight or 29.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes; but we are making an exception.

Mr. DU PONT. That is not to the interest of the Government, though.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not know.

Mr. DU PONT. The interest of the Government is to get younger officers, so that when they arrive at responsible positions they will not be superannuated. That is the point I want to make.

Mr. HUGHES. Of course, we started out to do something abnormal. We started to depart from the ordinary method of getting these officers, and if we enter upon this path it seems to me we should clear away all obstructions from it. I have no particular interest in this matter, but it struck me, upon reading the terms of the legislation itself, that we are holding out the hope of appointment to the Military Academy to a large body of young men in this country, and at the same time we are saying to them, by the terms of our own legislation, that they have no chance.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey a question.

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly; I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator says he has made some inquiry about this matter. I wish to ask him if it is not a fact that a small part of the enlistments are under the age of 21, because of the attitude of parents toward enlistment by their sons?

Mr. HUGHES. Oh, undoubtedly. The legal age is 21; yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know I have found in my experience, where some boy had by misrepresentation gotten upon the list and was appointed, that his parents have applied for his discharge upon the ground that his age had been misrepresented. I know it is a fact that there is, or there has been in the past—I do not know what the situation will be in the future—a very decided sentiment among parents against their sons enlisting in the Army before they have reached the age of 21.

Mr. HUGHES. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I had assumed that that had reduced to a very small number the enlisted men now who are under 21 years of age, and who would or could get the benefit of this legislation.

Mr. HUGHES. I have not the figures. I applied to the War Department for them. I first asked the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, and he estimated that the average enlisted age was about 21. I think he is correct in that, but I do not know. I communicated with the War Department, and they promised to have the information for me in 10 or 15 minutes. More than that time has elapsed, and I have not heard from them. They said they would telephone here.

Everyone is familiar with this situation. Parents come to the Representatives and Senators thinking that their boys have enlisted and were not 21 and that they were entitled to be discharged and entitled to be discharged at once. Of course, the Government officials threatened them with prosecution for a false oath, and the parents, wisely, in my judgment, abandon any attempt to get their children out of the service, but it is a question whether or not boys enlisted under those circumstances to get into the Army could properly take advantage of the provisions of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, House bill 408, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power, and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

Mr. MYERS. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I can not consent, so far as I am concerned, to that direction. This water-power bill has been before the Senate for over a week. We have heard it fully discussed. I think we ought to be ready to vote upon it.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator yield to me? The Committee on Indian Affairs on March 9 directed me to report back the Indian appropriation bill. It will be remembered that the bill failed last year and the necessity for the passage of the Indian appropriation bill is obvious to all Senators, and it is urgent. I wish to give notice that as soon as I can get the floor, after the Military Academy bill is disposed of, I shall move that the Senate take up the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection to the request of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to be heard.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to state the reasons for my objection while I have the floor.

Mr. JAMES. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia if he will not allow us to finish the Military Academy bill. It will take only a few moments more.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not want to object to proceeding to the conclusion of the bill the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] has in charge. I will vote to take it up, to displace the water-power bill. What I am objecting to is keeping the water-power bill as the unfinished business. I think it ought not to remain longer the unfinished business. The debate has been full about it; the issues between the Senators from the Western States on the subject are understood. If we are to have a vote upon it, well and good; but I am unwilling to see it kept here as the unfinished business with other matters coming in and it remaining the unfinished business. So I object to the unanimous consent asked.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, before this matter is ruled on I should like to be heard, when other Senators are through.

Mr. ASHURST. I beg pardon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the Chair understand the matter. The request for unanimous consent is certainly not debatable for an hour or two. Is there objection to temporarily laying aside the unfinished business?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to make a motion.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, a point of order. A motion is not in order until this is disposed of. I make that point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the request to temporarily lay aside the unfinished business is limited to the bill the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] has charge of, I shall not object; but if it is generally to be temporarily laid aside, I object.

Mr. ASHURST. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 10385, being the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. HUGHES. Pending that motion——

Mr. MYERS. I should like to be heard before the Senator makes that motion. I want to say that while the water-power bill has been technically the unfinished business of the Senate for about a week, it has been debated for a part of two afternoons—about one-half day all put together. Why has it been laid aside the rest of the time? To make room for appropriation bills and preparedness measures. That is the reason. I am anxious to see the water-power bill kept before the Senate as continuously as possible; I am anxious to have a vote taken on it as soon as possible; and I am anxious to see final action by this body; but I realize the higher and more pressing and immediate necessity of action on preparedness measures and appropriation bills.

It is my understanding that it is at least an unwritten rule, if not a written rule, of the Senate that appropriation bills have the right of way over other measures. That has been the practice at least ever since I have been here. Several times appropriation bills have been called up in the last week, and that caused delay in the consideration of the water-power bill. Then, at the solicitation of many Senators and with the full cognizance of the importance of preparedness measures, and knowing the attitude of the President and the administration in regard to them, I have consented to lay aside the unfinished business several times for preparedness measures. I consider that the bill is entitled to consideration which has been before the Senate up to 2 o'clock, it being one of the preparedness measures.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I make a suggestion to the Senator?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I understood the Senator from Georgia would not object to laying the unfinished business aside for the purpose of proceeding with the Military Academy bill.

Mr. MYERS. I understand the same thing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There has been an objection——

Mr. MYERS. I wish to finish my remarks, if the Chair please. As I said, my attitude has been a disposition to have the unfinished business temporarily laid aside for appropriation bills and preparedness measures, but otherwise to keep it as continuously as I might be able to do before the Senate. I think the motion of the Senator from Arizona is ill timed, at least, if not unparliamentary. If he wants——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment. By the rules of the Senate the question is not debatable. The Chair has been granting the Senator from Montana the right, without objection, to make a statement, but a motion to take up a bill after 2 o'clock is not debatable.

Mr. MYERS. It is not debatable before 2 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; it is not debatable after 2 o'clock.

Mr. MYERS. Rule VIII provides that it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will read Rule IX.

Immediately after the consideration of cases not objected to upon the calendar is completed, and not later than 2 o'clock, if there shall be no special orders for that time, the Calendar of General Orders shall be taken up and proceeded with in its order.

I shall not read all of it—

And in such case the following motions shall be in order at any time as privileged motions, save as against a motion to adjourn, or to proceed to the consideration of executive business, or questions of privilege, to wit:

First. A motion to proceed to the consideration of an appropriation or revenue bill—

That is what this is—

Each of the foregoing motions shall be decided without debate and shall have precedence in the order above named and may be submitted as in the nature and with all the rights of questions of order.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I crave permission to make a statement to the Senator from Arizona if he will withhold his motion.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. I decline to yield, and I hold the floor.

Mr. HUGHES. On this ruling——

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator permit me a word to the Senator from Arizona? If the Senator from Arizona will withhold his motion, I will ask to have the unfinished business temporarily laid aside. Then when the cadet bill is disposed of he can move to take up the appropriation bill, if he wishes, and I will not oppose it, and we will not in that way displace the unfinished business. I now renew my request.

Mr. ASHURST. Much as I love the Senator from Montana, I will not do a thing that will put me in the position in which I was placed last year. I yielded to this Senator and I yielded to that Senator, and I lost my bill. I will not consider such a proposition. I stand on my motion, as much as I love the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. It is no love to me. You are displacing the bill which the Senator from Oregon has in charge.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 10385, being the Indian appropriation bill? [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. MYERS. I ask for a division.

The VICE PRESIDENT (after a division). The motion prevails and the Chair lays before the Senate House bill 10385, making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be laid aside for the purpose, and the purpose only, of disposing of the Military Academy bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. MYERS. I understood that the Senator from Arizona was not going to yield to anyone under any circumstances or conditions in relation to the Indian appropriation bill. What he meant apparently was that he would not yield to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. NORRIS. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move, notwithstanding the objection, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 4876) to provide for an increase in the number of cadets at the United States Military Academy. Mr. President, we have been working on this measure about four days——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4876?

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES].

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I rise to oppose the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey. Our first consideration is not some class of men or what will benefit some particular class, but what will be the greatest benefit to the Army itself. Anything which raises the age of entrance into the Army over and above the present limits, which I think are already too high, would be distinctly, in my judgment, harmful to the military service.

When I was a midshipman in the Naval Academy the maximum age of entrance to that institution was 18, the minimum age was 14, so that graduates could not under any circumstances be over 21 when they left the institution.

The age limit has been increased at the Naval Academy and it has been increased at West Point. I think it has been bad judgment to do so, because by raising the age limit a man reaches command rank very frequently at a time when he is too old to assume the responsibilities which come to him. It has been one of our greatest difficulties in the Navy that the command rank of commanders and captains has been so high, they have been so many years in subordinate places, that they really have not been competent to assume the great responsibilities which the commanding officer of a man-of-war must assume. To some degree that applies in the same way in the Army. For a man to reach the position where he is going to assume the occupation of his life at the age of 28 or 29 is to my mind without any excuse whatever. If he has not reached the primary stages of his life occupation by the time he is 23 or 24 years old, before he gets into places of responsibility, he is going to lose a large part of that initiative which must go to make up a successful career.

I hope, Mr. President, that the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey will not be given serious consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MYERS in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey. [Putting the question.] The Chair is unable to determine it, and will put the question again.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us have a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All in favor of the amendment will rise. [A pause.] All opposed to the amendment will rise. [A pause.] The amendment is carried.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I suggest the absence of a quorum. There was no quorum present on the vote, and that is the reason why I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was not announced by the Chair. The Chair announced that the amendment was carried.

Mr. HUGHES. The amendment was carried.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think the Chair will take notice of the fact that not a quorum voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has observed a practice of the kind he followed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to have it entered of record that there was not a quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has suggested the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. That does not affect the adoption of the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair it does not. The Chair will pass on that when we get to it. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Colt	Hardwick	Lea, Tenn.
Bankhead	Cummins	Hitchcock	Lee, Md.
Beckham	Curtis	Hollis	Lewis
Brandegee	Dillingham	Hughes	Lodge
Catron	du Pont	Husting	McCumber

Chilton	Gore	Johnson, S. Dak.	Myers
Clapp	Gronna	Jones	Norris
Clark, Wyo.	Harding	Kenyon	O'Gorman

Oliver	Ransdell	Smith, Ga.	Thomas
Overman	Reed	Smith, Md.	Thompson
Owen	Robinson	Smith, S. C.	Underwood
Phelan	Shafroth	Sterling	Wadsworth
Pittman	Sheppard	Stone	Warren
Poindexter	Sherman	Sutherland	Weeks
Pomerene	Simmons	Swanson	Williams

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] on account of official business of the Senate. I wish also to announce that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. The senior Senator from Virginia is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. The junior Senator from Virginia is paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Do I understand that the Chair has declared the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] was adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair ruled that it had been adopted.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the vote by which the amendment was agreed to be reconsidered.

In this connection I wish to state to the Senate just what it is. The age limit placed upon the admission into the Academy of a cadet under the bill is between the ages of 19 and 22. The Senator from New Jersey moves to amend by raising the age limit to 25. Mr. President, I do not think the amendment ought to have been adopted, and, really, when it was adopted there were very few Senators present, and I desire to have the vote reconsidered.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, as I recollect it, the Senator from Oregon voted against the amendment, and under the ordinary parliamentary procedure he has not a right to move to reconsider the vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On that point of order the Chair will rule that no record vote—no yea-and-nay vote—having been taken any Senator can move to reconsider. That is the understanding of the Chair of the parliamentary practice. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. HUGHES. The motion made by the Senator from Oregon is debatable, I presume.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so holds.

Mr. HUGHES. I will state that since the vote was taken I have received word from the War Department that some time ago they compiled a list with the idea of getting at the average age of first enlistments. They compiled a list of a thousand men, and the average age of first enlistments in the Regular Army, as shown by that list, is a little over or a little under, I am not certain, 23 years; which fully bears out the statement I made to the Senate that I thought the average age of the first enlistment was over 21 years of age.

Here we are put in the position of attempting to legislate for the benefit of men in the Regular Army and in the National Guard and at the same time we are fixing a limit which is two to three years below the age prescribed in the very legislation we are attempting.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if his amendment applies generally or only to those coming from the National Guard and enlisted men.

Mr. HUGHES. Only to the National Guard and to the Regular Army. I am not proposing this legislation. I am not standing here as some one who desires to do something for the National Guard or to do something for the Regular Army. Other Senators originated this legislation. It is abnormal; it is out of the usual line; it is a new procedure. Surely if we are going to do it, we ought to make it complete and we ought to do it wholly. It can not to a great degree affect the average age of the graduates of either of these institutions.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from New Jersey permit me?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator realize that those men who go into the academy at 25 graduate at 29 and are all the time at a disadvantage from that time on, because before they arrive at the higher grades age has provided for their retirement or they become superannuated.

Mr. HUGHES. I realize that.

Mr. WARREN. Whatever may be the Senator's idea as to what the age for the Army cadets is going to be, he should remember that with the few we provide for there will be thousands in the Army who went in at 18 and 19, and who can go in and it is better for the man, it is better for the United States, it is better for the Army that those who go to West Point should go early, mature early, and take their place in command accordingly.

Mr. HUGHES. I realize what the Senator says, but at the same time it does not make very much impression upon me for the reason that a man who succeeds in graduating at the age of 29 is a good deal better off than a man who never had any chance to graduate at all. A man who gets a commission at the age of 29 is better off than a man who never had a chance to get a commission at all. By the terms of this enactment we are shutting out obviously more than half of the enlisted men of the Army and of the National Guard, and I am unable to compute how many more than that. We are probably shutting out 80 per cent of the enlisted strength of these two organizations.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HUGHES. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think that by keeping the age limit as it is it would encourage enlistments in the Army earlier than otherwise would take place?

Mr. HUGHES. The law provides that a man can not enlist in the Army without the consent of his parent or guardian until he is 21.

Mr. SHAFROTH. They do enlist by virtue of the consent of the parents at 18, and will it not have a tendency—keeping the age limit and having the inducement to go to a military academy—to gain the parents' consent that they should enter the Army at an earlier age?

Mr. HUGHES. It does not seem as though the Government wants them at a much earlier age, unless it changes the regulations in that direction, but as I have stated so often in the course of this discussion, we are here attempting to do something for two organizations—the National Guard and the Regular Army—and here is a provision shutting out perhaps 80 or 90 per cent of the members of both those organizations. It is true that the men who go to the academy by means of this legislation, graduating at the age of 29, will be handicapped, so far as their position and their rank is concerned, compared with men who go through in the regular way, but that is the vice of circumstances over which they have no control. We are trying to legislate for men who have such a handicap that they had no chance in the ordinary course of things to go to the Military Academy, men who feel a desire to enter it, men with military aptitude who have enlisted in the National Guard or in the Regular Army. There is no chance for them as the law now stands. We have set about doing something for them. Let us not frame the legislation so as to defeat our own purpose.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to ask the Senator if his amendment would in any way discourage anyone who wanted to join the Army through the National Guard or the standing army from going in earlier?

Mr. HUGHES. It would encourage them.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Of course, it would.

Mr. HUGHES. It offers this temptation or this inducement to a much larger class than would be offered under the legislation, as proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I suggest to the Senator that there are many men who join the Army after they attain a certain age and their parents do not want them to waste their lives there. They may go into the Army after they reach their majority. Such men who would take advantage of the provision offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, as the law stands to-day, there is no boy whose parents do not desire him to follow a military profession who can go into the Army until he is 21 years of age. Under the provisions of this proposed act he must serve one year. That will make him 22 years of age; and under the provisions of the existing act at 22 years of age he is automatically disqualified from participating in the benefits of this legislation. That is all there is to my amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I wish to say again that I hope the Senate will reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] was adopted. Figuring that the age of men in the enlisted strength of the Army is about 23 years, or a little less, as the Senator states, is like figuring the per capita wealth of the United States. Figuring on that basis many men who have not a dollar in the world would appear to have a good deal of money. As a matter of fact, there is a very large number of men in the United States Army who are under 20 years of age; and the fact ought to be patent when you figure that the average age being 23 or under, and the admission to the Army being from 18 to 35, the greatest number of the men are young, upward of 25 or 26, or somewhere about that age. So there are many thousands of men in the Army who could be appointed under the provisions of this bill.

In talking about the effect this will have upon the enlisted strength, Mr. President, we ought not to forget the effect it will have upon the country. When a man gets to be about 29 years of age and has just left college he has pretty nearly reached middle life, and the Army is therefore deprived of the benefit of the service of a commissioned officer from the age of, say, 24 or 25 until he retires. If this amendment should be adopted it would make him graduate from the academy at 29 years of age, and I think that is too old.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey was adopted.

Mr. HUGHES. I call for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I am paired for the day with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have a general pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. On that account I will withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CATRON. I am paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], who is absent. I do not know how he would vote if present, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] and the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] has a pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. We have transferred our pairs, so that we may both vote. I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I inquire if the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN. Under the arrangement just announced by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] I vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I am requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]; and

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—43.

Bankhead	Gallinger	O'Gorman	Smith, Md.
Beckham	Gore	Oliver	Smoot
Brandegee	Harding	Overman	Sterling

NAYS—22.

Ashurst	Lane	Reed	Tillman
Hollis	Lee, Md.	Sheppard	Underwood

Catron	Johnson, S. Dak.	Owen	Works
Chilton	Jones	Penrose
Clarke, Ark.	Kern	Pittman

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have no desire to discuss the matter now; I have discussed it before. I simply want to remark that those Senators who were present and heard the debate having carried this motion, it is now probable that those who were absent and did not hear the debate will defeat it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I desire to substitute the word "twenty-four" for the word "twenty-five." I do not like to bore the Senate—at least that portion of the Senate which was here—with a repetition of the discussion. I feel certain, however, that if the Members of the Senate who have voted on this question had heard the discussion the amendment would probably have prevailed, and at the risk of trespassing upon the patience of those who were here I will say again that the object of the amendment is to enable the men whom we seek to benefit to really benefit by the provisions of this legislation. I will say once more that the legal age of enlistment in the United States Army and in the National Guard is 21 years, and that under the terms of this bill a man must serve one year before he can receive this benefit. That makes him 22 years of age; and at 22 years of age, automatically, by the terms of the legislation, he can not receive an appointment to West Point.

Further than that, I am not posing here as a friend of the Regular Army or as a friend of the National Guard; but the provision for the appointment to West Point of enlisted men of the Army and of the National Guard has been offered ostensibly in the interest of those two organizations, and I am trying to perfect it and make it possible for the members of the National Guard to benefit by it and to make it possible for the enlisted men of the Regular Army also to benefit by it. It is immaterial to me what the Senate does with it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly,

Mr. LODGE. Is not the Senator mistaken about the age limit? The age limit at West Point is 22, and at the Naval Academy, as I understand, 20.

Mr. HUGHES. I was speaking about the provision of the pending bill which purports to enable us to appoint men from the Regular Army to West Point, and which provides that they must serve one year in the Army, and yet they can not be appointed to West Point after they are 22.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator stated that the age limit at West Point was 21, as I understood.

Mr. HUGHES. No; I did not say that.

Mr. LODGE. I beg the Senator's pardon. I understood him to say so.

Mr. HUGHES. At least I did not intend to state that. What I attempted to state was that under the legislation which is now proposed and is before the Senate for action, and which purports to be an attempt to benefit the enlisted men of the Regular Army and the members of the National Guard, the legal age for enlistment in both bodies being 21 years, and enlisted men being required to serve one year, they will be 22 before they can become eligible for appointment, but after they attain the age of 22 they can not be appointed, under this legislation, to West Point. It is true that a great many men enlist before the age of 22. I do not want——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming and Mr. DU PONT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. HUGHES. I yield to any Senator who desires to interrupt me.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I want to ask the Senator a question. I do not agree with him entirely in his statement that this piece of legislation is intended solely for the benefit of the members of the Army. I think it is intended generally for the benefit of the whole country; but I wish to ask him whether this bill, as it now stands, with the age limit which the committee has fixed, does not benefit the National Guard and the Regular Army?

Mr. HUGHES. I am afraid not; that is all that is troubling me.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Does it not give them more privileges than they have now?

Mr. HUGHES. I doubt if it does to any great extent. One would have to know the ages of the cadets.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But what benefit of West Point have they now?

Mr. HUGHES. They have none, and they, perhaps, will have none after this legislation is enacted. I do not think we should stand here pretending to these men that we are giving them a benefit and giving them a privilege, when, as a matter of fact, perhaps we are giving them nothing of the sort.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Is the Senator able to say how many under the age of 21 are now in the Army?

Mr. HUGHES. I have been unable to obtain that information; but I have learned that the average age on first enlistment—not the average age of the men who compose these organizations, but the average age at first enlistment in the Regular Army—is about 23 years.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But the Senator must know how absolutely worthless the average age is in arriving at a conclusion as to how many are under 21.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not think it is worthless when it is the average age at first enlistment. I am not talking about the average age of the men in the Army but the average age of the men who present themselves to the officers of the Army to take the oath as enlisted men.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There might be 10,000 men in the Army under the age of 19 and still the average age might be 23.

Mr. HUGHES. That might be so, and the converse of that might also be true.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. DU PONT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. HUGHES. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I wish to ask a question of the Senator from New Jersey. I desire to ask the Senator whether, in his opinion, it is not true that the vast majority of young boys who enlist in the Army under the age of 21 belong to the undisciplined and uneducated classes, who, from the very nature of the case, from the very reasons which led them to enlist, could not pass the entrance examination to the academy?

Mr. HUGHES. I should say that that was probably true, and I should say that the highest type of men that we get——

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President——

Mr. HUGHES. I should like to answer the Senator from Mississippi, and then I will yield to the Senator from Delaware gladly; I do not care to pursue the discussion any further than necessary. I say that the highest type of men we get, either in the naval or the military service, are men who override the objections of their parents, to do which they must wait until they are 21 years of age.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. HUGHES. I will yield as soon as I have finished what I have to say in reply to the Senator from Mississippi. The very class of men to whom I have just alluded are absolutely prohibited from getting the benefits of this legislation. Now I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, I wish simply to suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that he make the age limit 23 years instead of 24. I think that would be logical. The maximum age at which appointees from civil life are allowed to enter the Army as commissioned officers is 27, it being deemed that that is the very oldest age at which it is to the interest of the service to allow men to enter as commissioned officers. If the Senator makes the limit in his amendment 23 and a cadet should enter at that age and spend four years at the Military Academy, he would on graduation have reached the maximum age at which civilians may now be appointed to commissions in the Army. That would coincide and conform with the practice so far as civil appointments are concerned, and there would be some logic in it.

Mr. HUGHES. I have no doubt that if we reduced the age limit, so that nobody could get into the service from either of these organizations, it would be eminently satisfactory to certain people. I realize that fully. I should like to have the limit 25; I should like to have it 26; but I am willing to take 24.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. I think the Senator from New Jersey will recognize the fact that with the consent of his parents or guardian a boy may enlist in the Army or in the militia at an age less than 21.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. At 18, 19, or 20.

Mr. HUGHES. I have stated that.

Mr. WEEKS. So that a very large percentage of those who enlist both in the militia and in the Regular Army might be given the privilege sought to be given to them.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not know how large that percentage is.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know, except from my own experience in the militia, and that experience leads me to the conclusion that almost all first enlistments are under the age of 21. Mr. President, that being the case, and this privilege being held out to the young men to go to West Point and obtain a commission, I ask, Is it possible that a parent would refuse to give consent to a boy to enlist in the service before the boy was 21 or 20 or 19?

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts I will say that I do not think this legislation is going to encourage enlistments to any great extent. The possibility of a boy getting into the Military Academy by means of this legislation is so remote that no parent who had a grain of sense would take it into consideration, in my opinion. But there is a chance to benefit a lot of men who have already enlisted without any hope of reward, without having had the aid of this stimulus; men who feel that they have military aptitude; men who would like to follow a military career; and they are the men we ought to seek to benefit, and they are the only men, in my opinion, who will be benefited, aside from the question of the general benefit of the country.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, he said a few moments ago, as I understood, that a great many do not want enlisted men in the Army to get into West Point.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator knows that as well as I do.

Mr. WARREN. Now, Mr. President, I think that remark was hardly called for. The situation is this: The Committee on Military Affairs have brought in here a proposition that, so far as I know, was never before spoken of by a single Member of the Senate outside of the committee. The Military Committee looked the matter over very carefully and initialed the move in favor of enlisted men. Under the amended bill it provides for about 66 a year to be admitted to West Point from the ranks of the Army. So if we confine this to 200 members altogether from the ranks of the Army, so far as age is concerned, the idea that, with 150,000 men or more in the Army, we can not pick out 66 per year, or 200 altogether, or 66 per year, is simply preposterous. We know that there are thousands and tens of thousands who go into the Army at the age of 18 or 19.

Now, we have to consider, in my judgment, the efficiency of the Army. We have to consider to some extent the United States. It costs a great deal of money to educate a man at West Point, and the United States is entitled to a long service rather than a short one. If a man enters the academy at the age which is now prescribed, he can complete 40 or more years of active service before he reaches the age of 64, which is the retiring age in the Army, thereby making a return to the United States for its expenditure. Not only that, but he begins his career as an officer early enough so that when he arrives at a position of importance, such as field officer, he is still young enough to possess the initiative which accompanies youth as compared to the older officer who may not possess the same initiative. If you fix the age at 25 or 24, you make another class at West Point; you make a class which goes hobbling along behind the others, arriving at positions of command at an older age, and therefore when they are probably less efficient. So that you entail more expense upon the Government and provide for less efficient service and you do not get any better officers. The idea of 66, or 75 even, a year at West Point from the Army out of 150,000 or more men is certainly not to be put off on the ground that they are all too old and have reached the age limit.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I hope the Senator does not desire a categorical answer to that question. I am not going to trespass further upon the time of the Senate except to say, what has already been said a dozen times in the presence of the Senator, that no matter how far behind one of these boys may be, he would be a good deal further advanced than if he remained an enlisted man in the Army and did not have this opportunity. That seems to me so self-evident that it hardly need be stated.

Now, as I have said, I am no more interested in this matter than are other Senators here. I wish, however, to disclaim any intention of reflecting upon any member of the committee or commenting upon any member of the committee in anything that I have said here. I said that there are certain people who would like to limit this bill so that no enlisted man, either of the Army or of the National Guard, could be admitted to the Military Academy. I believe that to be true; I believe the members of the Committee on Military Affairs believe it to be true. I was not referring, however, to them. I ask for a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. HUGHES. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I again announce my pair for the day with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], and therefore withhold my vote. I will let this announcement stand on any other votes for the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). Under the arrangement hitherto made with the Senator from Michigan, I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CATRON. I inquire whether the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. CATRON. I transfer my pair with him to the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CHILTON. I announce my pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. In his absence I withhold my vote. I also wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]; and

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

So Mr. HUGHES's amendment was rejected.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I move that, in line 11, on page 2 of the bill, the word "twenty-two" be stricken out and the word "twenty-three" inserted in lieu thereof.

I appreciate the point made by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], that the young man who is prevented by his parents or guardian from entering the service until he is 21 years of age would have no chance under this bill, he being required to serve for a period of one year either in the National Guard or in the Regular Army before he is eligible for appointment. I think that class of young men should be given a chance; and under this amendment there will be one year in which they will have that chance after they have served for a period of one year.

I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CATRON (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], I vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of my pair as on the former ballot and withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I inquire whether the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. THOMAS. I have a pair with that Senator, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). The same arrangement being made between the Senator from Michigan and myself, whereby we transfer our pairs and let the pairs stand against each other, I vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I make the same announcement and transfer as on the previous vote and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I made upon the previous roll call, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES. I announce my pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. GRONNA. I inquire whether the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. GRONNA. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON. I transfer the pair I have heretofore announced to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] and will vote. I vote "yea." I also desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] and the fact that he is paired with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]; and

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

The result was announced—yeas 59, nays 2, as follows:

So the bill passed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to make a statement to the Senate on a matter about which I have been asked a good many times.

The Army reorganization bill has been reported from the Senate committee to the Senate and is now on the calendar. If we could have gotten the right of way on Monday, it had been the purpose of our committee to attempt to bring it up for consideration at that time. It has been postponed until this time, however, and the House bill, we understand, will probably pass to-night and reach the Senate to-morrow morning.

Our committee therefore thought it advisable, after conference about the matter, to take up the House bill in committee, and not undertake to dispose of the Senate bill without having the House bill before the Senate at the same time. So we will not be able to take up the subject until the House bill has been considered by the committee.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ASHURST. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10385) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the bill be read for committee amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the request? There being none, it is so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, do I understand that the bill is being read now for amendments? For what purpose is the bill being read now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For committee amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, in the item of appropriation for the construction, repair, and maintenance of ditches, reservoirs, and dams, purchase and use of irrigation tools and appliances, water rights, ditches, lands necessary for canals, and so forth, on page 3, line 4, after the date "1914" to insert "and to remain available until expended," so as to read:

For the construction, repair, and maintenance of ditches, reservoirs, and dams, purchase and use of irrigation tools and appliances, water rights, ditches, lands necessary for canals, pipe lines, and reservoirs for Indian reservations and allotments, and for drainage and protection of irrigable lands from damage by floods, or loss of water rights, including expenses of necessary surveys and investigations to determine the feasibility and estimated cost of new projects and power and reservoir sites on Indian reservations in accordance with the provisions of section 13 of the act of June 25, 1910, $235,000, reimbursable as provided in the act of August 1, 1914, and to remain available until expended.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator in charge of the bill why that committee amendment was made? I know what the object is, but I would like to know the reasons why it was done.

Mr. ASHURST. The reason, as given, was that it would obviate the necessity for reappropriation of that amount. That amount being necessary, if at the end of the fiscal year there should be an unexpended balance, the committee is of the opinion that that would preclude the necessity of a reappropriation of it.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true, it would preclude that; but I rather think that is a bad policy to follow, unless it is an emergency matter and unless the amount appropriated is to be expended during the year.

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator will pardon me, if I remember the statements of the commissioner correctly, this was in the nature of an emergency appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. It would not be much of an emergency appropriation if it was going to be extended beyond the 30th of June, 1917.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, the explanation that was given was that after beginning the work the season might be ended before its completion. By being able to continue the work in the spring without being prevented from doing so by the close of the fiscal year they could continue to a completion without having to reorganize their forces of workmen or storing their tools and supplies.

Mr. SMOOT. There may be wisdom in the amendment; but as a general thing a provision of that kind is not a good policy to follow.

Mr. LANE. I think the Senator is quite right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in page 4, line 2, after the word "sanatoria," to strike out "$350,000" and insert "$400,000," so as to read:

For the relief and care of destitute Indians not otherwise provided for, and for the prevention and treatment of tuberculosis, trachoma, smallpox, and other contagious and infectious diseases, including transportation of patients to and from hospitals and sanatoria, $400,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 9, after the word "purpose," to insert ": And provided further, That hereafter physicians regularly employed in the Indian Service may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be allowed in addition to annual leave educational leave not to exceed 15 days per calendar year, such leave to be cumulative for two years for post-graduate work."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). If there is no objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, there is objection. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee how the physicians are employed in the Indian Service? Are they employed under civil service, or do they have to pass an examination?

Mr. ASHURST. They are employed under the direction of the civil service,

Mr. GALLINGER. They pass an examination?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator think that the physicians who are being employed in the Indian Service need to be educated after they get there?

Mr. ASHURST. No; the thought in the mind of the committee was, and it was suggested to the committee by the department, that there should be a post-graduate course, that physicians in attending a post-graduate course would be able to keep in touch with new discoveries in medical science, and it would be a very good thing. It is known that the most eminent physicians of the day do not hesitate to acquire knowledge through a post-graduate course.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly not; but does the Senator think it is more important that physicians in the Indian Service should be granted leave to qualify themselves than physicians in the Army and Navy?

Mr. ASHURST. No; I do not.

Mr. GALLINGER. No such leave is granted to those physicians.

Mr. ASHURST. That is true.

Mr. LANE. Will the Senator permit me? I think physicians on isolated reservations, where they do not come in contact with other physicians to exchange experiences, should be allowed to go once a year to brush up. The Senator himself knows that there are changes in methods, and quite frequently new discoveries in medicine and surgery are made, and therefore this is necessary.

Mr. GALLINGER. Most of these physicians are in the bounds of civilization.

Mr. LANE. A great many of them are not.

Mr. GALLINGER. A few of them.

Mr. LANE. Quite a number of them are isolated on the Pacific coast and in New Mexico and Arizona.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will inquire further what is the annual leave for these physicians?

Mr. ASHURST. One month. This simply gives them a month and a half.

Mr. GALLINGER. If they have to brush up, does not the Senator think that a month would be sufficient?

Mr. President, I hope the Senator will agree to have the proviso stricken out. It is extraordinary, and I see no reason whatever for it.

Mr. ASHURST. The view of the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire, of course, has great weight with me, but he must not forget that these physicians, to begin with, are underpaid, in my judgment, and, secondly, they go into isolated portions of our country.

Mr. GALLINGER. A few of them do.

Mr. ASHURST. A vast majority of them do; and, as the Senator from Oregon has well said, they frequently do not have an opportunity to consult other physicians for six, seven, or eight months at a time.

Mr. GALLINGER. They can take medical journals.

Mr. ASHURST. That is true.

Mr. GALLINGER. And get books.

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator will pardon me, the view of the committee was that the health of the Indians should be considered above all things. What is the use to educate the Indian unless we take every precaution possible to preserve his health?

Disease among the Indians has been increasing at an alarming rate, and the committee took every possible precaution it could to see to it that every means possible to take care of the health of Indians should be used. That accounts for this provision.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to the Senator that the health of the Indians and the life of the Indians is no more important than the health of our soldiers and sailors.

Mr. ASHURST. I cheerfully grant that.

Mr. GALLINGER. We do not educate the physicians at the expense of the Government who go into the Army and Navy after they get there.

Mr. ASHURST. Our committee have no jurisdiction over that question regarding the Army or the Navy, and I would not even by inference allow it to be understood that I thought the health of the Indians is more important than the health of soldiers or sailors, but it is equally important.

Mr. GALLINGER. I make a point of order against the proviso, that it is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is in relation to the first proviso?

Mr. GALLINGER. Beginning with the words "and provided further," commencing in line 9, and ending at line 14 with the word "work." It is general legislation. It provides that hereafter certain things shall be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona desire to be heard on the point of order as to why it should not be sustained?

Mr. ASHURST. No; I do not. I am bound to confess that it is general legislation. I want to be fair enough to do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 14, after the word "each," to insert:

And provided further, That the proviso in the act of August 1, 1914 (38 Stat. L., p. 584), which limits the cost of erection and equipment of hospitals authorized therein to $15,000 each, is hereby amended so as to approve the expenditure of additional sums for the purposes named not exceeding $2,500 in any one case: Provided, That the total expenditures for erection and equipment of said hospitals shall not exceed $100,000, the aggregate amount authorized for that purpose by the act in question.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that the act of August 1, 1914, appropriated $100,000 for the building and equipment of hospitals, and limiting the expenditure for any one hospital to $15,000.

Mr. ASHURST. That is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. And conditions have happened, I suppose, where one or more hospitals are intended to be built or are being built will cost more than $15,000.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. And the limit is to be, under this provision, $17,500?

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, in the same paragraph, in the proviso on page 4, beginning with line 2, it is provided that "not to exceed $90,000 of said amount"—that is, the $400,000 appropriated—"may be expended in the construction and equipment of new hospitals at a unit cost of not exceeding $15,000." If $15,000 was too small an amount for a unit expenditure in 1914, it certainly seems to me that it must be too small an amount now.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is entirely correct about that.

Mr. SMOOT. I wanted to call the Senator's attention to that.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. If $17,500 is necessary in one case then "$15,000" should be changed to "$17,500" in line 5, page 4.

Mr. ASHURST. I hope that amendment will be made. I move, on line 5, page 4, to strike out "$15,000," where it occurs, and to insert in lieu "$17,500."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to strike out the figures "$15,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$17,500," in line 5, on page 4.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the committee to insert the matter beginning on line 14, page 4.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, in line 24, after the words "appropriation of," to strike out "$350,000" and insert "$400,000," so as to read:

That out of the appropriation of $400,000 herein authorized, there shall be available for the maintenance of the sanatoria and hospitals hereinafter named, and for incidental and all other expenses for their proper conduct and management, including pay of employees, repairs, equipment, and improvements, not to exceed the following amounts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 6, on page 5.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the omission of the dollar sign following the word "Nevada."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be changed by the clerks at the desk without any action by the Senate.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 8, after the words "Choctaw and Chickasaw Hospital, Oklahoma, $20,000," to insert "to be immediately available."

Mr. GALLINGER. I will inquire of the chairman of the committee what the emergency is that requires this one appropriation to be made immediately available? Why differentiate, in other words, between that particular hospital and the others?

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment, I will refer to the Senate committee hearings. The showing before the committee was to the effect that this was necessary owing to the unfinished condition of the hospital and, further, that there is an immediate need for this hospital for the Chickasaws and Choctaws.

Mr. GALLINGER. Are the other hospitals completed and this hospital not completed?

Mr. SMOOT. It is not for the completion of the hospital; it is for maintenance.

Mr. ASHURST. For maintenance.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; for maintenance.

Mr. SMOOT. It seems to me that making this appropriation immediately available can only be justified, if justified at all, from the fact that they have spent all their appropriation of last year and now want the appropriation made to cover the expenditures for this fiscal year as well as the expenses for the coming year.

Mr. GALLINGER. And as a result there will probably be a deficit next year.

Mr. SMOOT. More than likely, because there certainly is this year.

Mr. ASHURST. Let it be stricken out.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 23, after the word "therewith," to insert "and for tuition of Indian children in public schools"; on page 6, line 1, before the word "blind," to strike out "and" and insert "or"; and, in line 2, after the word "children," to strike out "Provided further, That not more than $100,000 of the amount herein appropriated may be expended for the tuition of Indian children enrolled in the public schools," so as to make the clause read:

For support of Indian day and industrial schools not otherwise provided for, for other educational and industrial purposes in connection therewith, and for tuition of Indian children in public schools, $1,550,000: Provided, That not to exceed $40,000 of this amount may be used for the support and education of deaf and dumb or blind Indian children: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation, or any other appropriation provided for herein, except appropriations made pursuant to treaties, shall be used to educate children of less than one-fourth Indian blood whose parents are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they live and where there are adequate free school facilities provided and the facilities of the Indian schools are needed for pupils of more than one-fourth Indian blood: And provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the support of Indian day and industrial schools where specific appropriation is made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading was continued to line 18, on page 7, the last paragraph read being as follows:

For collection and transportation of pupils to and from Indian and public schools, and for placing school pupils, with the consent of their parents, under the care and control of white families qualified to give them moral, industrial, and educational training, $72,000: Provided, That not exceeding $5,000 of this sum may be used for obtaining remunerative employment for Indian youths and, when necessary, for payment of transportation and other expenses to their places of employment. The provisions of this section shall also apply to native Indian pupils of school age under 21 years of age brought from Alaska.

Mr. SMOOT. At the time this provision was first made in the Indian appropriation bill the question was discussed at some length. I want to ask the chairman of the committee what the result has been since the appropriation of this amount of money for obtaining employment for Indian youth. Is there any report showing what has been done under the past appropriation?

Mr. ASHURST. I can not give the Senator any official report, but I can give him a statement of my own information. About 5,000 Indians per year leave their tribal relations and assume the duties and burdens of American citizens. In every instance, I am advised, where it is possible or practicable to employ an Indian he is given preference in nearly all the positions in the Indian Service, and where the salary is under $800 an Indian is employed. I will say as a general proposition they are very largely employed, so far as it is practicable to do so. I have no detailed figures at hand to give the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the original idea was not only to secure employment for the Indian youth in the Indian Service, but it was to go further and secure them employment outside the same as artisans and other classes of people. It goes so far as to provide for transportation expenses, and so forth. I wonder, now that this appropriation has been made for a number of years past, what results, if any, have been obtained from the appropriation in securing employment for Indian youth who have been educated outside of the Indian Service in communities——

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMOOT. I gladly yield.

Mr. CURTIS. The graduates from nonreservation schools are furnished, wherever possible, employment, and the employment of the Indians attending the Carlisle School and the Haskell School has been very successful. They have been employed by farmers in that section of the country and some of them have been educated as blacksmiths and bakers and in other trades. They have been helped in securing employment. I understand from the commissioner that this is a very helpful provision, and I think it is money well expended.

Mr. SMOOT. I was very much in favor of the provision when it was first proposed in an Indian appropriation bill, and being interested in it at the time, I simply wanted to find out what the result had been.

Mr. CURTIS. I can not give the Senator the number, but I know of my own personal knowledge that a large number of students of nonreservation schools are being employed on farms and in private houses, and I know of some bakers and blacksmiths who have secured employment.

The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 18, to insert:

All moneys appropriated herein for school purposes among the Indians may be expended, without restriction as to per capita expenditure, for the annual support and education of any one pupil in any school.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee what that means? It is very peculiarly phrased.

Mr. ASHURST. The language was furnished to the committee by the department. Prior to 1911 there was a law which limited the expenditure for pupils at reservation boarding schools to $167 per capita. The increased cost of living during the last few years has made it entirely impracticable to reduce the cost per capita to that amount. I read from page 26 of the Senate committee hearings:

Senator CURTIS. Does that not depend upon the number of pupils you have? It does not cost you that much in the larger schools, does it?

Mr. MERITT. No, sir; conditions vary in different schools. We are now able to keep the cost down in some of these larger reservation schools to $167, but where we have a small enrollment, and in some of the smaller boarding schools, it naturally costs a good deal more to keep the children in those schools.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will not trouble the Senator to read further, as far as I am concerned. I understand now what the purpose of it is. It is to remove the restriction which limits the per capita expenditure to $167 per year. It that right?

Mr. ASHURST. That is true. The trouble with it is——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The trouble is the language does not accomplish that. It reads:

All moneys appropriated herein for school purposes among the Indians may be expended—

Then follows the parenthetical clause—without restriction as to per capita expenditure—for the annual support of any one pupil in any school.

Literally, therefore, it means that all moneys appropriated herein for school purposes may be expended for the annual support and education of any Indian pupil in any one school.

Mr. THOMAS. That is precisely what I rose to call attention to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator does not want to accomplish that I know.

Mr. ASHURST. I am not as familiar with the resources of the English language as my friend the Senator from Utah, but I can see there is a defect in the provision and I cheerfully consent to any amendment that will effectuate the purpose.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I suggest to the Senator to eliminate the last phrase "for the annual support and education of any one pupil in any school" so that it will be without restriction.

Mr. ASHURST. Permit me to say that it is not a continuing provision. It is necessary to include it in every bill and I think it has been in every bill. I think the language may be improved, however, and it ought to be improved.

Mr. THOMAS. It is not an apt expression as it now stands.

Mr. SMOOT. It may have been in the last appropriation bill but I doubt very much whether it has been in all the past bills. Is the language in the last appropriation bill the same as this?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. Meritt says on page 59 of the House committee hearings in answer to a question propounded by the chairman:

Yes, sir; that has been in the Indian bill for a number of years, but you will notice that it is not continuing legislation.

Of course he does not say this identical language has been in the former bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Utah covers the point. The only object was to remove the limitation on expenditures. There is a question whether or not it is wise to do so. I think Senators should be informed that at one school it is costing $319 a student and at another over $270. I have taken the position on the committee that where it costs as much as that it would be best to abolish the Indian school and send the children to public schools and pay the tuition. The assistant commissioner advised the committee that it is impossible now at the smaller schools to educate the children on $167 per capita.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to ask the Senator if he will not allow this amendment to go over? Then we can look into it further.

Mr. ASHURST. I have no objection at all.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit me, I venture to suggest that it might be a good way to reach the criticism of the Senator from Utah by merely providing for the repeal of the statute which contains the restriction. That would be much better than legislation designed to avoid and set aside for the purposes of the bill a restriction which was enacted as a piece of general legislation.

Mr. SMOOT. But the law as it was enacted not only covers this appropriation but other appropriations in the Indian appropriation bill, and the restrictions on other appropriations are necessary.

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. THOMAS. I understood the explanation given to be that the statute restricting the expenditure for school purposes to $167 per capita was found by experience to be too small, and it was the purpose of this proviso to do away with the difficulty in consequence of that fact. Of course my suggestion had reference only to that provision of the statute which imposes the restriction. I think it would be much better to set it aside by appropriate language than to provide, without any reference to it whatever, that this money can be expended practically with no limitation per capita upon the amount of expenditure.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator the idea is to restrict it only to this particular appropriation.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator means the appropriations in this bill?

Mr. SMOOT. No; this particular appropriation. There are other appropriations in the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. If that be so, then certainly the phraseology should be amended.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator there.

Mr. THOMAS. The language is not, of course, appropriate here for that purpose.

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator will pardon me, I am not seeking to defend the chastity of the particular language employed.

Mr. THOMAS. I understand that precisely.

Mr. ASHURST. Although in defense of the committee I ought to say that I have adverted to the bill passed in 1900 and the one before that. I read from the act approved August 1, 1914:

All moneys appropriated herein for school purposes among the Indians may be expended, without restriction as to per capita expenditure, for the annual support and education of any one pupil in any school.

The commissioner has simply adopted the identical language which was in a prior law and which had been in Indian appropriation bills since 1911. A construction having been put on the language by the department, I presume for that reason this language was adopted.

Mr. THOMAS. I presume so; and that it is a good reason for it.

Mr. ASHURST. I agree to the language of the amendment, so far as I can accept it.

Mr. THOMAS. The language is, to my mind, remarkable for the accomplishment of the avowed purpose that is to be subserved by it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah to strike out all after the word "expenditure," on page 7, line 1, down to and including the end of the sentence in line 21.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I hope that language will not be stricken out. I ask that the amendment go over.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from North Dakota certainly does not want to agree to the language in that provision, because, literally interpreted, it means that all moneys appropriated under this bill may be expended for the annual support of any one pupil. That is nonsense; nobody wants that. What you want to do is to remove the restriction upon the per capita expenditure.

Mr. GRONNA. That is correct.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The criticism I make is that the language does not accomplish that. It ought to read:

All moneys appropriated herein for school purposes among the Indians may be expended without restriction as to per capita expenditure.

Put a period after the word "expenditure" and eliminate the remainder of the paragraph; omit the comma after the word "expended," and then you have expressed what you want to do.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. Speaking only for myself, I will say that it seems to me that that amendment would fully meet the situation and obviate the difficulty. I hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. If the chairman of the committee is satisfied that it does so, I shall make no objection. Of course, all the committee intended to do was to remove the restriction. There are schools where it is necessary to expend more than $167 per capita.

Mr. ASHURST. That is true.

Mr. GRONNA. It is necessary to increase that expenditure at some schools on account of the heavy overhead charges; that is all; and that was the intention of the committee.

Mr. ASHURST. I think the suggestion made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] and also the suggestion made by the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] fully covers the case, namely, to strike out all after the word "expenditure," in line 21.

Mr. GRONNA. I have no objection to that, if it is agreeable to the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] to strike out all after the word "expenditure," in line 21, page 7, down to and including the word "school," in line 22, on the same page.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is now upon agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 8, line 14, after the word "Indians," to strike out "$425,000" and insert "$500,000," so as to read:

For the purposes of preserving living and growing timber on Indian reservations and allotments, and to educate Indians in the proper care of forests; for the employment of suitable persons as matrons to teach Indian women and girls housekeeping and other household duties, for necessary traveling expenses of such matrons; and for furnishing necessary equipments and supplies and renting quarters for them where necessary; for the conducting of experiments on Indian school or agency farms designed to test the possibilities of soil and climate in the cultivation of trees, grains, vegetables, cotton, and fruits, and for the employment of practical farmers and stockmen, in addition to the agency and school farmers now employed; for necessary traveling expenses of such farmers and stockmen and for furnishing necessary equipment and supplies for them; and for superintending and directing farming and stock raising among Indians, $500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 16, after the word "Wisconsin," to insert:

Provided further, That, when practicable, no money appropriated herein shall be expended on or after January 1, 1917, for the employment of any farmer or expert farmer whose salary shall be in excess of $50 per month, unless he shall first have procured and filed with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs a certificate of competency certifying that he is a farmer of actual experience and qualified to instruct others in the art of practical agriculture: And provided further, That this provision shall not apply to employees now in the Indian Service: And provided further, That it shall not apply to Indians employed or to be employed as farmers.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to inquire of the Senator having the bill in charge from whom this "certificate of competency" is to be obtained? What is the authority to issue it? As the amendment now stands, a certificate signed by anyone, whether competent or otherwise, would seem to comply with the requirement of the amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. There is an obvious hiatus there. The intention of the committee was to insert the words, "certificate signed by the president of the university of the State, or an adjoining State, in which he seeks the employment," or, perhaps, it should be the president of the agricultural college.

Mr. THOMAS. I was going to suggest that it should be "agricultural college" to be appropriate.

Mr. ASHURST. It should be "agricultural college." That language has been left out of the print of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, after this matter is acted upon I wish to ask a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. STERLING. May we hear the amendment now stated, Mr. President? I supposed that the Senator from Arizona had the amendment at hand.

Mr. ASHURST. I will read it in just a moment, if the Senator will permit me. I move, after the words "practical agriculture," in line 24, to insert:

Such certificate to be certified and issued to him by the president of the State agricultural college or university of the State in which his services are to be rendered or by the president of the State agricultural college or university of an adjoining State.

I ask that that amendment be inserted merely to perfect the pending amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arizona will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the words "practical agriculture," in line 24, page 8, it is proposed to insert:

Such certificate to be certified and issued to him by the president of the State agricultural college or university of the State in which his services are to be rendered or by the president of the State agricultural college or university of an adjoining State.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, the one objection I should have to the amendment suggested by the chairman of the committee is that I do not see how the president of a State university would be qualified necessarily to give such a certificate as that. There would be some reason in the president of a State agricultural college giving such a certificate, but for the president of the State university to give such a certificate, it seems to me, might be a meaningless thing.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit me, I think that what the committee had in mind was to use the word "university" where that is the designation of the agricultural institution of the State. The amendment might be improved, therefore, by providing that the certificate shall issue from the president of the State agricultural college or State agricultural university. I do not know of any State where the agricultural college is so designated, but it occurred to me that that might have been the purpose the committee had in view.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I assume that what is intended is that in those States in which the institutions are consolidated the certification shall be made by the president of the university.

Mr. STERLING. I would so take it, I will say to the Senator from Montana, from the reading of the proposed amendment. I can not see how the president of the State university, unless that institution includes the State agricultural college, would be qualified to give such a certificate.

Mr. WALSH. I should assume that in those States in which the institutions are separate, the president of the university would decline to act, and would say to the applicant that he must make his application to the president of the agricultural college. Take the State of Wisconsin, for instance. The school of agriculture and mechanic arts is a school of the university, and there is no president of any agricultural college.

Mr. STERLING. Then, why might not the difficulty be entirely obviated and the intention be made plain by saying that the president or the dean of the State agricultural college—in Wisconsin, for example, there is an agricultural college, but it is under the supervision of the dean—let it be the president or the dean of the State agricultural college.

Mr. WALSH. I think that suggestion is a good one.

Mr. STERLING. Leaving out the word "university."

Mr. GRONNA. There is a misprint here. The amendment is not printed in the way suggested, and I therefore ask that it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the amendment going over?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the amendment goes over, I want to interrogate the Senator in charge of the bill as to the phraseology of the amendment. It is somewhat involved. In line 24 it is provided that this provision shall not apply to employees now in the Indian Service, nor shall it apply to Indian employees to be employed as farmers. The amendment reads:

No money appropriated herein shall be expended on or after January 1, 1917, for the employment of any farmer or expert farmer whose salary shall be in excess of $50 per month.

Then it exempts all those in the service, so that this can only apply, as I read it, to farmers who are to be employed hereafter and who are not now in the service. Manifestly, they have not any salary, and I would suggest to the Senator that the language would be better, as I look at it, if the words "whose salary shall be in excess of $50 per month" were changed so as to read "at a salary in excess of $50 a month." The salary will be established when they are employed.

Mr. ASHURST. I accept the suggestion, and I trust the amendment will be amended in that way.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I suggest to the Senator, in line 22, on page 8, where it reads "a certificate of competency certifying," that the word "showing" would be better than the word "certifying," so that it would read:

A certificate of competency showing that he is a farmer.

Mr. ASHURST. There is no objection to that, and I hope the amendment will be amended to that extent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, I do not quite understand why an Indian employee, I presume at the same salary as a white man, should be exempted, as such employees are in lines 1 and 2, on page 9. If an Indian is employed at the same salary as a white man, it seems to me he ought to have the same qualifications.

Mr. ASHURST. As I said a moment ago, in this bill we are trying, or we hope we are trying, to incline in every instance on the side of the Indian. We do not feel that it is right or necessary to subject him at all times to the same rules that are applied to the white man, as that might work a hardship upon him. We want to open the door of opportunity as wide as possible that he may obtain employment.

Mr. GALLINGER. But would it be to the advantage of the Indian to have an incompetent Indian farmer trying to instruct him? Ought not the Indian instructor to be as competent as the white instructor?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, it has been the rule of the department to give the Indian employment on Indian reservations without requiring him to take the civil-service examination. The Indians are employed, first, as assistants, and then, as they become qualified, they are promoted. The amendment was inserted so that Indians would not be deprived of positions held by them if they are qualified in the judgment of the Indian Bureau, and they should not be required to take a civil-service examination for the position of farmer, as they are not required to take a civil-service examination for other places.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, it does not amount to very much anyway; only it strikes me that if we are going to require a certificate that the white man is competent to instruct the Indian, it is rather an anomaly to put Indians in that position without the same qualifications.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I think I ought to give the Senate—and I will do it in a few words—one of the reasons that induced the committee to incorporate this language in the bill. A habit has grown up—and it is a very unfortunate one, but the present commissioner is not to blame for it; he found the situation already existing—under which men would be appointed as farmers and would be paid a salary to teach or to attempt to teach the art of agriculture to other people when they themselves had no knowledge of that art.

With reference to the matter of employing Indians, the committee felt that an Indian would be more amenable and would yield more quickly to the suggestions of an Indian farmer, who, perhaps, did not fully understand the art of agriculture, than he would to a white person who did understand it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the provision the committee has inserted in the bill requiring that these men shall show their competency is a very wise one, and I have no particular suggestion to the clause relating to the Indians, although it is anomalous.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, before the amendment is passed over I should like to ask the Senator with reference to the proviso in lines 24 and 25, which reads:

And provided further, That this provision shall not apply to employees now in the Indian Service.

Does the committee mean by that language that employees who are now in the Indian Service, whether they are employed as farmers or not, shall not be subject to the first proviso, namely, that they shall have a certificate of competency?

Mr. ASHURST. It refers, or was intended to refer, to farmers, because it would be pro tanto a repeal of the civil-service law if we attempted to exempt other persons now in the service. I have no objection to inserting, and I think it would more effectually carry out the purpose if we inserted, the word "farmers."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If that is the purpose of the Senator, then he had better reframe the language——

Mr. ASHURST. Have the word "employees" changed to "farmers."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. So that it will read:

That this provision shall not apply to persons who are employed in the Indian Service as farmers or expert farmers.

Mr. ASHURST. I think that is a very valuable amendment, Mr. President, and I hope it will be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will now state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 25, in the committee amendment it is proposed to strike out the word "employees" and to insert the word "persons," and after the word "now," in the same line, to insert the words "employed as farmers or expert farmers," so as to read:

This provision shall not apply to persons now employed in the Indian Service as farmers or expert farmers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is it desired now that the amendment go over?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, on page 640 of the Senate hearings I find that the amendment as it was offered is printed in full. It reads as follows:

And provided further, That no money appropriated herein shall be expended on and after January 1, 1917, for the employment of any farmer or expert farmer whose salary shall be in excess of $50 per month, unless he shall first have procured and filed with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs a certificate of competency, certifying that he is a farmer of actual experience and qualified to instruct others in the art of practical agriculture, such certificate to be certified and issued to him by the president of the State agricultural college or university of the State in which his services are to be rendered, or by the president of the State agricultural college or university of an adjoining State: Provided, That this provision shall not apply to employees now in the Indian Service: And provided further, That this shall not apply to Indian employees in the service, etc.

I agree, Mr. President, that that ought to be amended, and I think that the last provision should be stricken out altogether. The complaint has been made that the men who are employed as expert farmers are in fact not farmers at all. They have been able to take the civil-service examination and they are given employment, but instead of being a benefit to the Indians they are really a detriment to them. They know absolutely nothing about practical agriculture. The amendment was designed to give the Indian Bureau the authority to go outside of the civil service when it was necessary to employ men who are really experienced in the art of agriculture. I agree that the amendments proposed by Senators should be adopted, but I also believe that the last proviso should be stricken out. If that is done I have no objection, and I shall not ask to have the amendment go over.

Mr. ASHURST. I see no objection to the suggested amendment being made, and, so far as I can, I will consent to it.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if the Senator means by the last proviso the one beginning in line 24, reading:

That this provision shall not apply to persons now employed as farmers or expert farmers—

And also to the other proviso, reading:

Provided further, That it shall not apply to Indians employed or to be employed as farmers—

I would object to those provisos going out.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not ask to have stricken out the provision relative to the Indians employed, but, beginning on page 9, line 1, and after the word "further," I think there should be stricken out the following proviso:

That it shall not apply to Indians employed or to be employed as farmers.

Mr. CURTIS. Does the Senator object to that provision?

Mr. GRONNA. I think it would be better if that were stricken out.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I think it would be a mistake to strike it out. We are trying to educate the Indians to be farmers. They are usually employed upon the agencies, where they understand the conditions. They are employed generally as assistant farmers. They know the Indians, and they can be of great service. Now, if you are going to let an Indian be employed in the civil service to fill a clerical position without taking the examination, and help him along in that way—if you desire to make farmers of the Indians—then these positions should be given them without requiring them to take examinations. As has been well said by the chairman of the committee, many of the assistant farmers can do more with the Indians on the reservation than can the white experts whom you send there. It seems to me that you will be doing the Indian a very great injustice if you prevent him from being employed as a farmer unless he can secure a certificate, because very few, if any, of the Indians have gone through agricultural colleges, and, unless the exemption is made, you shut out every Indian from being employed upon a reservation as a farmer or as an assistant farmer if the salary is over $50 a month.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask that the amendment go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 9, line 18, after the word "exceed," to strike out "one" and insert "three," and, in the same line, after the word "permanent," to strike out "warehouse" and insert "warehouses," so as to read:

For the purchase of goods and supplies for the Indian Service, including inspection, pay of necessary employees, and all other expenses connected therewith, including advertising, storage, and transportation of Indian goods and supplies, $300,000: Provided, That no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be used for the maintenance of to exceed three permanent warehouses in the Indian Service: Provided further, That section 3709, Revised Statutes, in so far as that section requires that advertisement be made, shall apply only to those purchases and contracts for supplies or services, except personal services, for the Indian field service which exceed in amount the sum of $50 each, and section 23 of the act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. L., p. 861), is hereby amended accordingly.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 22, after the word "exist," to strike out "$8,000" and insert "$10,000," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of judges of Indian courts where tribal relations now exist, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 17, after the words "Secretary of the Interior," to strike out "$90,000" and insert "$100,000," so as to read:

For the purpose of determining the heirs of deceased Indian allottees having any right, title, or interest in any trust or restricted property, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, $100,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, at this point I will ask the Senator in charge of the bill what is the aggregate increase in the bill over the bill as it came from the House of Representatives?

Mr. ASHURST. The total appropriations carried in the bill as it passed the House were $8,961,437. The total increase made by the Senate committee is $2,994,249.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not going to express any great solicitude in connection with this bill as to the revenues of the Government, but I notice to-day a pretty elaborate scheme is being considered for increasing the taxes which the American people will have to pay after we get through with the legislation of this session. In view of that fact and of the further fact that there is a very substantial deficit in the revenues of the Government at the present time, it seems to me that the committee in this case has been pretty liberal in adding to the appropriations. I presume the additions are wisely made; I am not going to object to that; only it occurred to me that if all the appropriation bills make an addition of about 30 per cent—and roughly that is about the amount that has been added to this bill—to the amount allowed by the House we will have a rather serious situation confronting us when we get around to the end of the session.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator will pardon me, I just want to say, first, that nearly all, if not all, the increases are estimated for. Secondly, the Committee on Indians Affairs is dealing with property belonging to the Indians, in value of over $1,000,000,000. The annual expense for maintaining and taking care of that property is $10,000,000, which means that only 1 per cent of the total valuation is required to administer the property. I think that when a property in value of a billion dollars can be administered by the year for 1 per cent, it is a very creditable and a very satisfactory showing.

Mr. GALLINGER. I quite agree with the Senator in that proposition; and yet the increase of 33 per cent over the House bill is rather startling.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in connection with the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire, I think it is well to call attention to the fact that while we are considering a bill which appropriates nearly $12,000,000 there are but 18 Senators in the Chamber interested in the measure—10 upon this side and 8 upon the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire, I think perhaps the statement ought to be put in the RECORD that the old system, under which we dealt with the Indians as a tribe, paying them annuities and giving them rations, required very much less labor and the employment of a very much smaller number of men; but as we begin to individualize the Indian and try to start him along lines of industry, it develops the necessity for the personal equation between those who are with him, and seek to guide and assist him, and the Indian himself. This has led to a very large increase in the cost of handling the Indian question. It is destined in the future, I think, to lead to even more cost.

Personally, I think the Indian problem is largely one of the character, the effort, and the personal equation of the man in the field who is side by side with the Indian. While his efforts have not always met with the success we wish for, I think the statistics show a very marked improvement. But of necessity the present system is bound to cost much more than the old system of dealing with them in their tribal relations.

I thought it was only proper to put this statement in the RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I want to be recorded as a friend of the Indian and a friend of any reasonable and proper appropriation for the Indian Service; and I do not ask any questions in a captious spirit at all or in an antagonistic spirit. I have never served on this committee and have given the matter only casual examination.

Now, I desire to ask a question of the Senator from Arizona or the Senator from Minnesota as to the progress the Indian is making in the matter of agriculture and in other pursuits in which we have hoped he would make progress. I presume he is making some progress. Is it satisfactory to the Senators who know much more about this matter than I do?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, personally, I have not the figures. About a year or so ago I did have the Indian Office furnish me with the figures of that time, showing the personal property that had come into the possession of the Indians and the extent of their stock operations. I think, as a general rule, they do better, perhaps, in dealing with stock, where the situation on the reservation will permit it, than they do in cultivating their lands.

Last summer it was my privilege to visit a reservation in northern Minnesota, known as the Red Lake Reservation, which perhaps is the least developed of any of the reservations. Many of the mixed bloods and more active members of the other reservations have gone to a sort of a central reservation, leaving the Red Lake perhaps the most aboriginal of any. It was their fair day, and of course I realized that they had on their best equipment; but it was really gratifying to go through the reservation, to go to their homes and see the progress they had made and to see the care they were taking, especially with their live stock and their horses. When we realize that a few years ago these people were all wearing blankets and living in tepees, without the slightest appreciation of the value of money, and not given to toil—in fact toil was rather regarded as a badge of servitude than otherwise—I can not help but feel that the progress has been remarkable.

This year some of the reservations have shipped large quantities of stock. Some years ago we adopted the plan of what we call a revolving fund, under which the department, instead of issuing them money, had the agents buy horses and feed and seed and take the Indian's obligations for them, and then in the fall, by attention to the matter, see to it that the Indian pays the debt. When you realize that a few years ago they had no concept whatever of commercial obligations, it is remarkable that in some of these cases nearly every dollar of indebtedness was paid the first year, although, of course, it must depend—and that is the point I emphasized a moment ago—largely upon the character and the activity of the man who is in personal contact with them. Upon this reservation which I visited last summer the Indians had certain funds coming to them, and the agent there adopted the plan of making advances and then in the fall, by attention, seeing to it that the Indian pays the obligation.

While I am on my feet, and not at all for the purpose of paying any compliment, I want to say that I think we should appreciate the efforts of the Senator from New Hampshire and other eastern Senators. Being vested with this work, it is quite natural that the committee, perhaps, would be inclined to be overzealous in the work and, viewing it as important in their relation to it, perhaps attach more importance to these appropriations than they otherwise should. I think it is very fortunate that there are Senators like the Senator from New Hampshire, who is willing to devote his time to a very just and proper scrutiny of these appropriations; and yet I want to say that during the years when it was my privilege to be chairman of the Indian Affairs Committee I never found a more cordial supporter of any policy that I could make plain as to its merits than the Senator from New Hampshire and one of the Senators from Massachusetts.

For one—and I think in that respect I share the feeling of the entire committee—instead of feeling that these Senators are captious, I think we all share in the thought that it is very well that those who naturally are not so much inclined to enthusiasm for these appropriations should scrutinize them with the utmost care and check what otherwise might be, perhaps, a disposition on the part of those intrusted with the work rather to run in advance of the real necessities and merits of the case.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the statement the Senator from Minnesota has made is very gratifying to me. While the question is not immediately before us, I want to ask one further question as to the education of these wards of the Nation.

I have been at Hampton and at Carlisle, and have taken a great deal of interest in what I have seen in those schools. I have been led to believe that great work was being done for the Indian youth in those schools, for which we appropriate money; but I have seen it stated over and over again that a very large proportion of the young men who graduate from those schools—sometimes it has been said almost all of them—go back to their former habits of life, many of them resorting to the blanket, as their fathers do, and as they did in childhood.

I know that there are remarkable exceptions—men like Dr. Eastman, who has made a great reputation for himself as a physician and teacher, and I have met a few others; but I should like to know from some Senator who comes in contact with the Indians whether or not this statement that is being made from time to time, largely I think in the East, is so, or whether it is, as I think it probably is, a great exaggeration?

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I will say for the information of the Senator that I have made a little study of that subject, being troubled with the same curiosity that he is. The facts are about as follows, on the average:

The Indian boy or girl is taken from its home to an Indian school, far removed from the country and climate, perhaps, in which it has been raised. It remains in the school from the time, say, that it is 6 or 8 years old until it has finished its education or until for some other reason it returns home. The unfortunate part of the whole thing, and the pity of it, is this: That child, after having acquired a taste for better ways of living, for cleanliness, for better dress, after having acquired a knowledge of how white people live and a desire to live in that manner, returns home and in many cases goes back into the conditions and home in which its parents live, which consists of a one-room shack unfit in many cases for human habitation, without a bed, without any sheets or blankets, without anything to sleep on but rags, and then upon a board floor. In a little cabin, a little shack, which is of necessity overheated and stifling in winter, where its brothers, sisters, and friends huddle around it, with 60 per cent of them in many cases troubled with tuberculosis and 75 per cent with trachoma, perhaps, in dire poverty, without enough to eat, without a dollar to go out into the world or upon its allotment to earn anything by farming, without a hoe or a horse or a plow or a harrow, without a package of garden seed, and no opportunity to make a cent, what can that child do? What do those children do? They of necessity put on a blanket, glad and thankful unto high heaven that they can get a blanket to put around them. They are compelled to go back. They are not only compelled to go back, but the conditions are such that they can never hope to succeed in life or to rise above them; and they are forced into a life for the living of which they are criticized.

The result is disastrous, and it would be so with anyone. The percentage of failures is not greater among the Indians than it would be among the whites under like conditions; and that they do not succeeed, that the boy goes off and gets drunk once in a while, and the girl in lots of cases goes down to the devil, if you please, need not astonish anyone.

That is what we are doing to the Indian children. We are continuing this system. We have tried it for years. It is a failure. We have not sufficient school facilities on the reservations to teach them at home, as should be done. The first duty, and our bounden duty, to them is to begin at the other end of the road. We ought to go upon the reservation, not with $400,000 to send those children to school, or whatever it costs, but with $4,000,000 or $40,000,000 of their money, if necessary, and put them in a position where they can make themselves self-supporting, so that they could live a life of reasonable comfort and respectability, with some hope, after they return from these schools; where they could live under conditions that would permit of their living the term of existence allotted to other human beings in this country. Then many of them, instead of being picked off by infectious diseases or blighted in their youth and dying at a rate unknown among the white men from tuberculosis, and going blind, would develop into useful citizens.

I do not mean to cast any reflection upon this item or the motives of the men who have created it and brought it in here; but those are the cold-blooded, indisputable facts, which can be demonstrated. Now, that is what happens. Your boy from Carlisle, your girl from Carlisle, the little boy or the little girl from Chemawa, in the State of Oregon, where I live, as a rule meet the same fate.

Mr. GALLINGER. So the moral of the situation is that after educating these boys and girls we could well adopt a much more liberal policy toward providing something for them after leaving school. Is that so?

Mr. LANE. We fail totally in our duty if we do not do that. It will be a failure without that.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator from Oregon made the statement that he has made, and he has contributed much information.

Some moments ago the Senator from Utah asked me a specific question as to the number of farmers, but I was unable at that time to supply the information. I now quote the figures or data that obtained in 1915. Exclusive of the Five Civilized Tribes there were in 1915, so far as any accounts show, able-bodied male adults to the number of 42,239, of which number 30,277 were engaged in some kind of farming and the other 11,000 were more or less engaged in some kind of agriculture. Those were largely fishermen and huntsmen, but they were engaged in some branch of agriculture.

As to the schools and school facilities, I will premise by saying that although the committee has made liberal appropriations and Congress for 30 years past has used care to establish schools, there are now a large number of Indian children—10,000 Indian children—who are not attending school, simply because they do not have facilities; they do not have teachers and sufficient houses.

I will give a few data here that I think are somewhat illuminating. I read from the House hearings, on page 47:

From reports for the school years 1915 it is found that there are in all 84,929 Indian children of school age, of whom 6,596 are ineligible for school attendance, leaving 78,333 to be provided for in Government, public, or private schools.

The following enrollment is shown: In Government reservation boarding schools, 9,899; in nonreservation boarding schools, 10,791; in Government day schools, 7,290; making a total of 27,960 enrolled in Government schools.

There are also enrolled in private and mission schools 5,049 and in public schools 26,438, so far as information has been received. This makes a total of 59,447 Indian children in all schools of whatsoever character outside of the Five Civilized Tribes.

I will say that the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman has at all times used every effort to enlarge the appropriations and to increase the school facilities; and I thank the Senator from New Hampshire for his observation on the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 11, in line 19, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$20,000" and insert "$25,000"; in line 22, before the word "appropriated," to strike out "$90,000" and insert "$100,000"; on page 12, line 1, after the words "of the," to strike out "heir" and insert "heirs"; and in line 2, after the word "property," to insert "of the value of $250 or more, or to any allotment"; so as to read:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to use not to exceed $25,000 for the employment of additional clerks in the Indian Office in connection with the work of determining the heirs of deceased Indians, and examining their wills, out of the $100,000 appropriated herein: Provided further, That the provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to the Osage Indians, nor to the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians in Oklahoma: And provided further, That hereafter upon a determination of the heirs to any trust or restricted Indian property of the value of $250 or more, or to any allotment, or after approval by the Secretary of any will covering such trust or restricted property, there shall be paid by such heirs, or by the beneficiaries under such will, or from the estate of the decedent, or from the proceeds of sale of the allotment, or from any trust funds belonging to the estate of the decedent, the sum of $15, which amount shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury of the United States and a report shall be made annually to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior, on or before the first Monday of December, of all moneys collected and deposited, as herein provided.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether that is a new provision or whether it has been in former appropriation bills?

Mr. ASHURST. It has been carried in former bills.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Just what is the purpose of it? Why should we require the $15 to be paid into the Treasury of the United States upon the determination of the question of heirship or in the other cases mentioned?

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator will pardon me, I think the department has pending 8,000 heirship cases, and of course that involves and entails an enormous amount of work. I do not know of any Indian or the beneficiary of any Indian who has objected to the fee of $15 being paid into the Treasury of the Government as a fund to cover to some degree the expenses of handling these heirship cases.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The service is all performed by an officer of the Government of the United States, is it not?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes, sir. The heirship fees collected during the last year amounted to $50,071.11. Fees erroneously collected and returned to the payers amounted to $885. The total amount collected was $49,186. I am reading from Document No. 120, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, 6,696 estates of deceased Indians were finally acted upon by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The matter struck me as peculiar, because I was at one time a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I do not recall any such provision as this in the appropriation bills which were reported during the time I was a member of the committee.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the practice has grown up in the last two or three years. I know it was not in the last bill that was reported during my previous service. I understand from the department that last year they reported sixty-six hundred and odd estates, and they think that where the estates amount to over $250 the heirs can afford to contribute this $15 toward the expenses. In that way the Government is partly reimbursed. Then there are many thousand cases pending, and these men visit the various reservations, and settle titles, and settle up estates, and collect money due to the heirs, and report to the department who the heirs are that are entitled to inherit the property.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask the Senator from Kansas—because I know how thoroughly well-informed he is about all of these matters—whether we have a statute of the United States which devolves upon the Secretary of the Interior the power to determine these matters of heirship?

Mr. CURTIS. Congress passed a general law a few years ago providing for the sale of inherited lands, and out of that provision grew the necessity of settling who the heirs were, and there was a great deal of trouble. For a time the department let the heirs go into the local courts and have a partition, and accepted that as final; but there was a good deal of complaint, and now the department undertakes to settle most of these estates.

In 1910 Congress passed an act which gave authority to the Secretary of the Interior, upon notice and hearing, to ascertain the legal heirs of deceased Indian allottees, and his decision thereon was made final. The act referred to became a law June 25, 1910.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Do I understand the Senator from Kansas to say that the only authority the Secretary of the Interior has for passing upon these questions is that contained in this appropriation bill and preceding appropriation bills?

Mr. CURTIS. No; there is also the general act of Congress authorizing the sale of inherited Indian lands, and the general act of June 25, 1910, enables him to settle the question of heirship.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is it not rather an unusual thing to allow an executive officer to determine questions of that character, which are essentially judicial in their nature?

Mr. CURTIS. That is true; but the records are in the Indian Office, and the department was supposed to be the best qualified to pass upon the question. It was for the purpose of expediting the settlement of the question by the Indian Office.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I think the general statute to which the Senator from Kansas refers is the act of June 25, 1910, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior, as I recall the statute, to determine this question of heirship.

Mr. CURTIS. That is the act, and the first part of it reads as follows:

That when any Indian to whom an allotment of land has been made, or may hereafter be made, dies before the expiration of the trust period, and before the issuance of a fee-simple patent, without having made a will, the Secretary, upon notice and hearing, shall ascertain the legal heirs of the decedent; and his decision thereon shall be final.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 17, after the word "them," to insert "regardless of their competency," so as to read:

Provided further, That if the Secretary of the Interior shall find that any inherited trust allotment or allotments are capable of partition to the advantage of the heirs, he may cause such lands to be partitioned among them, regardless of their competency, patents in fee to be issued to the competent heirs for their shares and trust patents to be issued to the incompetent heirs for the lands respectively or jointly set apart to them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What is the meaning of the expression, beginning on line 17, "regardless of their competency"?

Mr. ASHURST. Of course, in the nomenclature of Indian affairs they have competent and incompetent Indians. It may not be a very happy expression, but a competent Indian in the nomenclature of Indian laws and treaties means an Indian who has been adjudged by the department or by a court of competent jurisdiction to be capable of administering his own affairs, one who has the power and ability to administer and does administer his own affairs.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is it intended to include infants?

Mr. ASHURST. I would say that infant Indians would, of course, be incompetent Indians.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not understand that the word "incompetency," as used generally in the law, includes the matter of infancy.

Mr. ASHURST. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I say, I do not understand that the word includes infancy. The general understanding of it is a person not of sound mind or otherwise not capable of looking after his affairs.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator will remember I said that in the nomenclature of Indian laws and treaties, the word is used in a large way. I do not want to take the time away from the Senator, but the word seems to be employed in a different sense in Indian treaties and Indian laws.

Mr. STERLING. I will say that the term is in constant use in the Indian Bureau in determining, for example, whether an Indian should have a patent in fee for his land. They are to determine whether he is capable of managing his own affairs and handling his own property or estate, and they judge whether he is competent or incompetent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 22, after the word "patent," to insert "or order of extension of the trust period set out in said patent," so as to read:

The trust period to terminate in accordance with the terms of the original patent or order of extension of the trust period set out in said patent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 1, after the word "crops," to strike out "$300,000" and insert "$400,000," so as to make the clause read:

For the purpose of encouraging industry and self-support among the Indians and to aid them in the culture of fruits, grains, and other crops, $400,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available, which sum may be used for the purchase of seed, animals, machinery, tools, implements, and other equipment necessary, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, to enable Indians to become self-supporting: Provided, That said sum shall be expended under conditions to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior for its repayment to the United States on or before June 30, 1925: Provided further, That not to exceed $50,000 of the amount herein appropriated shall be expended on any one reservation or for the benefit of any one tribe of Indians.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator from Arizona yield for a question on this item?

Mr. ASHURST. I cheerfully yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have heard on more than one occasion, Mr. President, about the purchase of cattle for Indians. Can the Senator tell me and the Senators present something of the policy of the department in that respect, as to the number of cattle which are purchased and their grade, and whether this increase in the appropriation will involve the purchase of an additional number over last year?

Mr. ASHURST. In response to the question propounded by the Senator from New York I have here a tabulated statement and the time might be well employed in having it read to the Senate as an answer in detail to the question which I am glad he propounded. I will send it to the Secretary's desk and ask the Secretary to read this tabulated statement.

[1] Horses.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I simply wanted to inquire of the Senator as to the total number of cattle purchased. Was anything brought out in the hearings before the committee in the way of a statement from the department as to the grade of those cattle and their cost per head? It is a very important matter when you go out and purchase cattle for another person that you purchase the very best kind.

Mr. CURTIS. May I answer the question?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I understand that it is the pleasure of the chairman of the committee to suspend the consideration of the appropriation bill at this time, and I rose to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ASHURST. I will say to the junior Senator from New York that I will have the question looked up as to the price per head of the cattle.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Kansas was about to give me information on the subject.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I will withhold my motion for that purpose.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Kansas is very ready in regard to figures, and I hope he will give it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Does the Senator desire to present it now?

Mr. CURTIS. I can do it at the session to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 23, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 22, 1916.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our heavenly Father, arouse all that is purest, noblest, best in us, that we may enter into the kingdom of heaven and enjoy the spiritual blessings which Thou hast prepared for us, and hallow Thy name by a richer, fuller service to our fellow men, since we pass this way but once, that we may leave in our wake a clear record as a legacy to those who shall come after us, that they may find the way a little smoother. So may we dwell in the house of the Lord now and forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1417. An act to erect or purchase, or both, a factory for the manufacture of armor.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey and Mr. JONES members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Treasury Department.

THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12766.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. GARRETT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12766, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12766) to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, on page 38, to perfect the paragraph which we passed over with the understanding that I should offer an amendment this morning for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, lines 6, 7, 8, and 9, strike out the words "such citizens of the United States as may have completed one year's satisfactory service in the cadet companies provided for in this act."

In line 9, strike out the word "and" before the word "such" and strike out the word "other" after the word "such."

Strike out the proviso beginning on line 11; after the word "Provided," in line 17, strike out the word "further."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, may we have the paragraph read as it will read when amended?

Mr. HAY. As amended the section will read as follows:

The President is authorized to appoint and commission as reserve officers of the various arms, corps, and departments, in all grades up to and including that of major, such citizens as, upon examination prescribed by the President, are found physically, mentally, and morally qualified to hold such commission: Provided—

And so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on line 22, page 48, by substituting for the period a comma and adding the following words: "and shall have the status of Federal soldiers within the meaning of section 8 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States whenever ordered into the service of the United States by the President: Provided, That commissioned officers shall take and subscribe to the following oath of office:

STATE OF ———, County of ———, ss:

I, ———, do solemnly swear that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of the State of ——— against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office of ——— in the National Guard of the United States and of the State of ———, upon which I am about to enter. So help me God.

And provided further, That enlisted men shall take and subscribe to the following oath of enlistment:

I do hereby ackuowledge to have voluntarily enlisted this ——— day of ———, 19—, as a soldier in the National Guard of the United States and of the State of ———, for the period of three years in active service and three years in the reserve, under the conditions prescribed by law, unless sooner discharged by proper authority. And I do solemnly swear that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the United States of America and to the State of ———, and that I will serve them honestly and faithfully against all their enemies whomsoever, and that I will obey the orders of the President of the United States and of the governor of the State of ——— and of the officers appointed over me, according to law and the Rules and Articles of War.

——— ———.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, or an amendment substantially in this form, was originally proposed to the Committee on Military Affairs by Gen. O'Ryan, of the New York State National Guard. He appeared to be very eager to bring the National Guard under Federal control just as far as possible. A number of the National Guard officers from all over the country appeared before the committee, and it was their desire, frequently and forcibly expressed, that they should be brought under national control. Many spoke of it as "federalizing" the militia, and asked that the militia be "federalized" to the limit. The National Guard Association, made up of officers of the National Guard of the several States, took up the matter through their executive council and have presented as the consensus of opinion of the National Guard this amendment in exactly the form in which I have presented it this morning. We of the committee believe, or at least hope, that this bill will place the militia largely under national control. It seems to me that national control is not only desirable, but essential for the ultimate success of the plan of a citizen soldiery. While I do not attach the grave importance to the bugbears of the 48 different commanders that is often given to it, nevertheless I realize that for discipline and training it is absolutely essential that there be one central head and authority, so that there may be uniformity in organization, discipline, and training.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TILSON. I yield.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I have been interested in the National Guard for more than 20 years and am at present an officer in it in the State of Illinois. I would like to have the view of the gentleman, even if it requires an extension of time allotted to him, upon this question. What is the source of the alleged authority of Congress to prescribe the limitations upon the right of the State to appoint officers, to prescribe the classes from which they shall come, to provide for the court-martial of officers by a board convened, it may be, by the Secretary of War, and for making the various provisions that are made in this bill for the conduct of the internal affairs of the National Guard in a time of profound peace. I concede that it exists when the guard is called to the colors, when they enter under the Federal control, but it is an important question that addresses itself to every State and is exciting much interest at the present time. I would like to have the valuable view of the gentleman, even though it requires an extension of his time.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I believe that under the provision of the Constitution authorizing the United States to raise armies, it has the right to raise those armies in time of peace as well as in time of war. I believe that the United States Government has the right under the Constitution to proceed to raise such volunteer force as may be deemed necessary, and if in the process of doing so it is decided to take men who are obligated to render service in the State Militia I can see no insuperable objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Because there is an obligation to serve the State, it does not seem to me that that obligation of itself precludes one from also assuming the obligation to serve the United States. The two services are in no wise incompatible. In fact, they supplement each other.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Must that obligation be a voluntary obligation on the part of the guardsman, or can the United States Government impose it on him, regardless of his own attitude?

Mr. TILSON. Under this plan it must be a voluntary engagement. Of course, the United States Government can conscript him if it will, but under this plan it is intended that it shall be voluntary, and the form of oath that the Clerk has just read from the desk, to my mind, is a voluntary engagement upon his part to serve in the National Guard of the United States, which is the National Volunteer force that we are attempting to create.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. FESS. We had a good deal of trouble in 1812 in calling for the militia, calling through the governors. In many cases the governors declined to respond. Was that due to lack of legislation, such as we are now attempting, or was it a right under the Constitution that we can not cure by legislation?

Mr. TILSON. I think it was largely because of lack of proper legislation, although I think that the national attitude has changed considerably, especially as a result of the war between the States. The result of that war settled the fact that these United States compose a Nation, and that the National Government is paramount.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman has no doubt as to our constitutional right to put the National Guard under the control of the Government even in time of peace?

Mr. TILSON. I have no doubt whatever that we are able to put the individuals who happen to compose what is called the National Guard under Federal control. I have not the slightest doubt on that point.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Will the gentleman kindly state upon what theory that belief exists?

Mr. TILSON. In the first place upon the theory that the Government has the right to raise armies for its defense, and in the second place upon the theory that because these gentlemen happen to be in the State Militia they are not because of that reason alone precluded from becoming a part of the volunteer forces of the United States.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I take it that the gentleman is of course aware that the report of the committee discusses this question very fully and cites the decisions from the courts in support of the authority assumed by this bill?

Mr. TILSON. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And the committee went over that matter carefully and presented the results of its findings in the report accompanying the bill.

Mr. TILSON. I will state that the entire committee, as is probably usual, did not make the report, although they, of course, agreed to the result of the report, which is the bringing in of this bill. The able chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] prepared the report and he will be able to state his own position in this matter. If I understand his position, he believes that in this bill we have accomplished that very thing already; that is, that we have put the National Guard under the control of the Federal Government, so far as its organization, discipline, and training are concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has again expired.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I take this opportunity to square my record in this House—upon the question of the federalization of the National Guard—with my conscience and my judgment upon that question. It has been stated that it was the unanimous opinion of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House that the Congress had authority under the present Constitution to federalize the National Guard.

Speaking for myself, I want to say here that I, as a member of the committee, did not believe when this bill was being framed that the Congress had that authority, nor do I now believe it. I will admit, Mr. Chairman, that this bill—and especially if the amendment of the committee which was adopted in committee the Thursday of last week is ratified by this House—will do much to strengthen the National Guard of this country and to make it a great dependable force, upon which the Military Establishment of this Government can depend in times of stress. I want to say, however, that if that amendment should not be ratified by this House that the National Guard would be left just where it is at present.

The bill as drawn and before the committee to-day, excluding the amendment, provided for the improvement of the National Guard on the condition that each State would come up with its proportionate part of the expenses. And what condition would we find before us on that proposition? It would mean that each State would have to increase its annual appropriation, which would not be done by many of the States of this Union. My State, which appropriates only $20,000 or thereabout a year for the maintenance of the militia would have been required under the provision as it was first outlined to appropriate anywhere from $117,000 to $375,000 a year for the support of its militia. The State of Kentucky does not need to expend that much money for its militia, and would not expend it, and I opposed that proposition in the committee, and would have opposed it on the floor of this House had not the amendment to which I refer been adopted by the committee. But the amendment cures that defect.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. I will.

Mr. McKELLAR. I simply wish to ask to what amendment the gentleman refers; he has not stated.

Mr. FIELDS. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] will present the amendment at the proper time. Now, Mr. Chairman, coming down to the question of the federalization, to which I wish to confine my remarks at this time, as I have said, this bill goes a long way toward strengthening the National Guard of this country, and I am glad it does; but can the Congress of the United States federalize the National Guard without taking absolute control of the National Guard? That is the question, and I am submitting these observations because I do not propose that my record here shall be pointed to in the future as one who acquiesced in the statement that the National Guard could be federalized by Congress, when I know or think I know that it can not be. [Applause.]

Under the Constitution of the United States the respective States reserved to themselves certain rights and certain concurrent jurisdiction over the National Guard. That very Constitution is in force to-day; therefore we must admit that these same rights that were reserved to the States in the framing of the Constitution are just as binding on the Federal Constitution to-day as they were the day the Constitution was made, and if we recognize these rights—and we must recognize them—we must admit that we can not federalize the National Guard.

I base my contention primarily upon the opinion of eminent jurists of this country. I find, first, in the case of Houston against Moore, Fifth Wheaton, the question of concurrent jurisdiction was discussed, and Mr. Justice Washington, in delivering the judgment of the court, said:

The Constitution declares that Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia in three specified cases: For organizing, arming, and disciplining them; and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers; and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress. It is further provided that the President of the United States shall be commander of the militia when called into the actual service of the United States. After the Constitution went into operation Congress provided by many successive acts to exercise those powers and to provide for all cases contemplated by the Constitution.

The last sentence of this statement is sufficient to show that it was the opinion of the court that Congress had no power over the militia not already exercised.

In delivering his individual opinion in the same case, Mr. Justice Story said:

It is almost too plain for argument that the power here given to Congress over the militia is of a limited nature and confined to the objects specified in these clauses, and that in all other respects and for all other purposes the militia are subject to the control and government of the State authorities. Nor can the reservation to the States of the appointment of the officers and authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress be justly considered as weakening this conclusion. That reservation constitutes an exception merely from the power given to Congress "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia," and is a limitation upon the authority which would otherwise have devolved upon it as to the appointment of officers. But the exception from a given power can not upon any fair reasoning, be considered as an enumeration of all the powers which belong to the States over the militia. What those powers are must depend upon their own constitutions, and what is not taken away by the Constitution of the United States must be considered as retained by the States or the people. * * * The general authority retained by them over the militia would seem to draw after it, as necessary incidents. If Congress should not have exercised its own power, how, upon any other construction than that of concurrent power, could the States sufficiently provide for their own safety against domestic insurrections or the sudden invasion of a foreign enemy? They are expressly prohibited from keeping troops or ships of war in time of peace, and this, undoubtedly, upon the supposition that in such cases the militia would be their natural and sufficient defense.

In the same case Mr. Justice Johnson, delivering his individual opinion, said:

Indeed, extensive as the powers over the militia is, the United States are obviously intended to be made in some measure dependent upon the States for the aid of this species of force. For, if the States will not officer or train their men there is no power given to Congress to supply the deficiency.

In the light of these and other opinions of justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, as well as opinions of different State courts, substantially adopting the views of Justice Story, and I refer particularly to the opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois in the case of Dunne against People (94 Ill. Rep., 121), decided in 1879, and the Supreme Court of Florida in the case of Acker against Bell (57 S. Rep., 356), decided December 12, 1911, it is clear that Congress can not federalize or exercise other power than that now exercised by it over the militia of the several States without first securing an amendment to the Federal Constitution, vesting in Congress the power of absolute control of same. The vesting of such power in the Congress would deprive the States of their powers over their militia, which was wisely reserved by them in framing the Federal Constitution; and in view of that fact, such an amendment should not be proposed, and in my opinion would be rejected by the States if submitted to them for ratification, for its adoption would make the States dependent upon the Federal Government for military protection against domestic insurrection or other internal strife too strong to be put down by civil authority. These functions should be performed by the States in their sovereign capacities, without dependence upon the will or adherence to the dictates of the Federal Government. Such a relinquishment by the States would be extremely unwise, and is inconceivable.

The State militia was very wisely ordained to perform a double function, namely, to protect the State in its sovereign rights, and to serve the United States when called upon to do so in executing the laws of the Union, suppressing insurrections, or repelling invasions. Its duties, therefore, are of both State and national character. Its mission is noble and its officers and men are patriotic. Its services to the State are indispensable, and it should not be taken from under the control which the State now exercises over it.

And, Mr. Chairman, in view of the decisions referred to, it is clear to my mind that Congress can not Federalize the National Guard without an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.] Such an amendment would deprive the States of their right to maintain a militia to protect them in their sovereign rights as a State, and it is therefore not fair to assume that the States would ratify such an amendment if submitted to them. I am not attempting to belittle the National Guard or speak disparagingly of it. It is a noble institution; its officers and men are patriotic. It was ordained to perform a double function, first, to protect the State in its sovereign right, and, secondly, to aid the Military Establishment of the United States when called upon to do so in executing the laws of the Union, in suppressing insurrections or repelling invasions, and to Federalize the National Guard, as has been proposed by gentlemen on this floor, would mean to deprive it of one of the functions for which it was created, and I contend, Mr. Chairman, that it can not be done under the present Constitution, and the statements that have been so often made that this bill will Federalize the National Guard are misleading. We could call water wine, but that would not make it wine. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know how much debate would be required on this proposition?

Mr. GORDON. I would like five minutes.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I am very much interested in this question, and I would like a little time.

Mr. LONDON. And I would like to offer an amendment.

Mr. HAY. I will not interfere with the gentleman offering an amendment at all. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto, and all amendments to the amendments, close in 30 minutes.

Mr. LONDON. Will that preclude my offering an amendment?

Mr. HAY. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate upon section 23 and all amendments thereto shall be concluded in 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I wish to say to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] that the gentleman from New York has an amendment to this section which should be given some consideration by the House, and I wish he would so frame his unanimous-consent request as not to include the amendment which Mr. LONDON is about to offer. It has nothing to do with the proposition.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman can have his amendment read for the information of the House and can discuss it within the 30 minutes.

Mr. KEATING. It would be impossible to discuss this and the other amendments in 30 minutes.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman can have it read for information now.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] ask unanimous consent to have his amendment read now?

Mr. LONDON. I want to have permission to discuss it for 5 or 10 minutes.

Mr. HAY. We can not do it in that time.

Mr. LONDON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York objects. All debate is closed. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. HAY. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment.

Mr. HAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, in order to arrive at some conclusion about this, and as I do not wish to shut anybody out——

Mr. GARDNER. The Chair recognized me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I myself am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON]. I am not a lawyer. I can not discuss all this question of the federalization of the militia, but I am going to read a sentence or two from an address by the Hon. Lindley M. Garrison, late Secretary of War, in New York City on January 17, 1916, with regard to this signing of a contract of enlistment. Now, I do not think any Member of this House is in any way trying to avoid the main issue. I am merely going to read what the Secretary says about people in the National Guard Association, or, to be more accurate, in the executive council of the National Guard Association, who take this point of view. Here is what the Secretary says:

They are suggesting that by providing by act of Congress that those who participate in these Federal appropriations shall agree to be mustered in national service in time of war a complete and satisfactory solution of the military problem is reached. Such a solution, of course, appeals to every pacifico, to every politico, and to all those who see therein an opportunity to divert Federal funds to local purposes.

Of course I know that this is not the motive of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], but it is the motive of the other people.

Diverse as are the motives of the pacifist and the others who are joined with him in an assault upon a real national policy, they both eagerly agree in support of these suggestions. They see therein the defeat of any real, substantial, valuable policy of national defense. They realize that if they can deceive the people into believing that these proposals provide a substantial response to the insistent demand for national defense, they will have accomplished what they set out to do, and in addition they will have personally benefited by the result.

Now, I do not in the least mean to imply that any Member of the House has any such ideas in his mind, but remember that the executive council of the National Guard Association is largely composed of paid adjutants general, several of them weighing at least 300 pounds apiece. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to arrange some time for the discussion of this proposition. I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] has an amendment to propose dealing with an entirely different proposition from that now before the House. I do not want to shut out the gentleman from New York, and in order that everybody may be heard who has indicated a desire to be heard, I move that debate on the section and all amendments thereto be closed at 20 minutes past 12 o'clock, which will give 40 minutes. There are a great many other sections where gentlemen can debate the general proposition without confining it to this one. But we must get along with this bill, and if there is any one proposition that the committee did agree upon it was the National Guard proposition. If, however, 40 minutes is not sufficient time, I am willing to give some more.

Mr. MANN. Let us see if we can not reach an agreement. Say that we have 30 minutes over here.

Mr. HAY. Then, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in one hour—30 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and 30 minutes by myself, 10 minutes of which I will yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this section——

Mr. HAY. I made the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] moves——

Mr. MANN. Ask unanimous consent.

Mr. HAY. The gentlemen are going to object over here.

Mr. MANN. Oh, do not object.

Mr. HAY. Very well, then. I ask unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and amendments thereto shall be concluded in one hour—30 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] and 30 minutes by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to impugn the motives of any Member who is advocating this amendment, nor do I question the motives of any of our Army officers who have been assailing the National Guard in recent years. Their motive is so perfectly obvious that any intelligent citizen ought to understand it.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, for the benefit of the House, can we not have the Clerk read the amendment again? A number of Members have come in since it was read.

The CHAIRMAN. This will not be taken out of the time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON]. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the pending amendment.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. GORDON. Now, Mr. Chairman, as I started to say when I was interrupted, we all understand the objections that our Army officers have to the National Guard. They do not furnish the officers for it, and therefore they want some Federal force, as they call it, that they can provide officers for. It is so perfectly obvious that their motive is one of self-interest that I do not think it is worth while to waste any time on it; the promotions and increased pay and allowances that necessarily follow an increase in the Regular Army is patent to all men.

What we are doing here is to try to frame a suitable and proper law for the people of the United States, not for the Army officers; and the amendment which is now pending, if it means anything, means an attempt to coerce the people who enlist in the National Guard into renouncing in time of peace the limitations imposed upon the Federal authority in the Constitution of the United States, defining the use which may be made of the National Guard when called into the service of the United States.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to his colleague?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. Is it not a fact that practically every member of the National Guard in every State in this Union, if the country required their assistance, would to-day rush to the colors?

Mr. GORDON. I think that is true. It has always been true in the past.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GARDNER. Can the gentleman tell me what proportion of the National Guard volunteered and were transferred into the service of the United States in the Spanish-American War?

Mr. GORDON. I know that less than 5 per cent of the men who had been through the Regular Army enlisted in the Spanish War, and that more than 100 per cent of the National Guard of Ohio volunteered in the Spanish-American War. [Applause.]

Now, I do not want to yield further. I want to make this point if I can. I say that if this amendment and kindred amendments which have been talked and talked and talked about throughout the country in the last year mean anything, they mean that they want to require men who enlist in the National Guard to renounce the limitations imposed in the Federal Constitution by the fathers of this Republic for the protection of the men who are always ready, and always have been ready, to defend their country in time of need.

The National Guard can only be used either by the Congress or the President of the United States for the three purposes specified in the Constitution, namely, to suppress insurrection, to repel invasion, and to execute the laws of the United States.

We think that use is sufficient, and we are opposed to any amendment that undertakes to interfere with those constitutional limitations in time of peace.

Oh, it may be argued that we can go ahead and pass it, and the courts or the Attorney General will knock it out; but that is not the way for men who are sworn to support the Constitution to act on the floor of this House. In the framing of the Dick bill they inserted a provision which President Roosevelt signed, providing that when the National Guard were called out the President could send them anywhere; but the Attorney General of the United States, in an opinion rendered in February, 1912, held that that provision, if it meant what it said, was unconstitutional, and therefore null and void. It still remains there in the statute, sticking out like a sore thumb. [Laughter.] This bill will repeal it.

Now, the late Secretary of War made some observations to which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] has adverted along the same line that we have heard. We had these Army officers before our committee, from the Chief of Staff and the Secretary of War down to the lowest officers. We had the benefit of all of the information that they saw fit to give us. We had the benefit of their technical knowledge upon this question, and their knowledge of the history of the Military Establishment in the United States. We listened to them patiently. We heard their arguments, and then we framed this bill.

Now, gentlemen, we may just as well look this question squarely in the face. If you want to build up a force that in time of peace can be sent by the President of the United States anywhere, out of the country and elsewhere, what you really want, if you want an efficient force, is to increase your Regular Army directly. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I heartily coincide with all that was said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] as to the need of building up the Regular Army.

I asked for time in order to speak upon this proposition, because for more than 20 years I have been connected with the National Guard of Illinois. I started into the National Guard of Illinois more than 25 years ago as a private, and I still retain my interest in that organization.

So far as I am concerned—and I speak for the National Guard of Illinois—I am in favor of federalizing the National Guard just as far as it can be done under the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.]

I am in favor of every man responding to the call of his country in its hour of need, no matter whether his service takes him across the sea, or into our insular possessions, or to the countries upon the south, or wherever else he may be required. [Applause.]

There should be no limit to the degree of fidelity with which a guardsman will respond to the wants of his country in its hour of need.

Now, I believe in that as a part of my existence, and in order that it may not be regarded as mere idle words, permit me to say that there has never been a crisis when it would seem that men would be required in this country that I have not put in practice this theory that I have not tendered my services to the War Department of the United States, and asked for assignment to active duty.

Just let me add this, so that my position may be well understood to-day, and that what I have said be not regarded as idle words:

There is on file in the War Department of the United States a communication asking for assignment to duty sent there within the last few days, tendering my services whenever and wherever my Government may require them; and should it require them I would take the greatest delight, and esteem it the highest honor, to step from the floor of this House to any position where I could render service to my country. [Applause.]

That is the position that I occupy. You will pardon the personal digression I know.

In saying this I also have in mind that if we are going to make the National Guard effective as a Federal aid, it must be done within constitutional lines. I believe, just as firmly as I believe in any fact the existence of which has been demonstrated, that in time of peace the Federal Government has not the power to step in and take over the National Guard and provide for the appointment of its officers, provide how many National Guardsmen a State shall raise, and provide by what they shall do, or, in other words, control the appropriations of a State, and specify in detail, as this bill attempts to do, how the National Guard shall be operated by the State.

In the State of Illinois we spend millions of dollars for our National Guard, and are glad to have the opportunity to do it.

In the State of Illinois we have gone to every length to give them comfort, assistance, and support.

In the State of Illinois, in the time of need, in the Spanish-American War, practically every guardsman responded. After the National Guard went to the front, we had 27 regiments of volunteers organized and tendered to the governor of our State, and we were ready to do our duty then, as we always have done it, and as we are ready to do it now.

Our people want the National Guard to be federalized, but they want them to be federalized along lines that are constitutional.

When you attempt to provide by your bill for court-martial of National Guard officers, by authority of the Government of the United States, when you attempt to provide for the manner in which the internal affairs of the National Guard shall be carried on and conducted in time of peace, I submit to those in this House who are familiar with the Constitution, if we are not going too far, and are we not taking a step for which there is no warrant in law?

We can use the strong arm if we so desire, and we can say we will pass this law and require the States to conform to it; but there will come a time when the States will not conform to it, when there will be an issue raised, when the question will be considered as to the power of Congress; and I do not want any such question as that to act as a check upon the use of the National Guard in the hour of need.

Now, it seems to me that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] by his amendment presents a feature that ought to have the serious consideration of this House.

When a man goes into the National Guard, if he is inspired by the proper feeling, he does not go in as a tin soldier. He does not go in merely to put on the uniform of blue or tan, and to follow the flag when days are fair, but he goes in to be a part of the second line of defense of the Nation.

Why should he hesitate to say so by his enlistment at that time?

If I mean that I will respond to my country's needs, why do I not put my hand to an enlistment paper and subscribe to an obligation that gives the country the right to call me?

And if I am not ready to do that, why not state the fact if I go into the National Guard?

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that whenever a man enters the National Guard there should be that dual obligation and there should be that dual aspect of his service prominent in his mind, first, to be one of the guard of his State, an honorable position, and, second, to be available quickly and immediately and willingly and patriotically in the hour when his country shall need him. That is the thing that I want to see——

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I gladly yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman think it is necessary, in order to stimulate the patriotism of the National Guard, to require them to subscribe to an iron-bound oath, such as the proposed amendment requires?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. No; I do not consider it is necessary to stimulate the patriotism of the National Guard.

I have the highest opinion of their patriotism.

I have been with those boys year after year in camp, on the field and on the march, and I know the thing that animates their minds.

I saw them at the beginning of the Spanish-American War, when they had their quarters in the sheep sheds of the State fair grounds of the State of Illinois for weeks, while the National Government did not supply them with blankets, or with but few of the things that were necessary for their comfort.

I know they are willing to go again; but why should not we of the National Guard silence the carping objections of those who say we will not respond, by putting in our enlistment contract an obligation that requires us to respond, and set at rest the question as to how much of a force the United States Government has in the National Guard to-day. That would settle that question.

We would be obligated to respond to the needs of our country, and it seems to me that such an obligation is not too much to ask the National Guard to accept. I believe the patriotism of the National Guard is such that they will gladly and willingly accept whenever they are asked to do so.

Mr. TILSON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Gladly.

Mr. TILSON. Is it not a fact that the National Guard themselves are asking for this very thing, to make it as strong as possible?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. The National Guard want to silence all possible criticism. Men say we will not go or serve our country in its extremity. Men say we are tin soldiers. Men say it is all for parade, when at the bottom of the heart of every man in the National Guard is a serious purpose to be of aid to his country in the hour of need.

Mr. CALDWELL. Has the gentleman read section 77, beginning on page 85?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Yes; I have read that and every other section with care, even section 76, where you propose to draft the National Guard, although the word "draft" is odious in the extreme.

Mr. CALDWELL. If they are drafted they will come, will they not?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Let me say to you here and now that the National Guard of the State of Illinois—and, in my judgment, the National Guard of any other State—does not require to be drafted in order to come.

They will come because it is their patriotic duty. They will come because they can serve their country by coming. They will come because every man of them wishes to be of service to his country if the need for his services should arise.

Mr. KAHN. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I will gladly respond, if I can.

Mr. KAHN. I understood the gentleman to say that he does not approve of the provisions of the bill which provide for the court-martialing of the National Guard during time of peace. Does not the gentleman believe that if there is discipline established for the organizations that Congress has the right to establish the discipline?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I believe that Congress has the right to establish discipline for the National Guard without any question up to a certain limit and a certain degree. I have in mind the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States and the leading case in Florida that the gentleman from Kentucky referred to and the case in our own State in the One hundred and fortieth Illinois, where these rights claimed in this bill are denied by high legal authority. I refer to the case of Huston against Moore, Fifth Wheaton, page 1.

So much of the Hay bill as relates to the National Guard is replete with unconstitutional provisions to an extent that creates amazement on the part of all who understand the situation, and in such respects utterly ignores the organic law of the land.

It is an attempt, by main strength, to deprive the various States of the rights guaranteed to them by the Constitution of the United States concerning their militia.

Subdivision 16 of section 8 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States provides as follows:

To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

In view of this constitutional provision and the construction placed upon the same by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Houston against Moore (5 Wheaton, 1), it becomes apparent to the most casual observer that this attempt on the part of the Federal Government to practically take over the militia of the different States in time of peace is absolutely illegal and in utter defiance of this constitutional provision.

It is quite apparent that there has been a surrender by certain officers representing the National Guard of the different States of the rights belonging to such States in order that the advantages conferred upon persons in the National Guard by this bill might be gained.

This action on the part of such officers becomes the more startling and the more reprehensible because of the fact that they have no authority to so speak for the States or waive any of the rights which belong to such States.

Evidently it is the thought of the Military Committee that the rights of the States may be trampled upon with impunity, and that the thing which they seek to accomplish with reference to the National Guard may be accomplished by main strength and without the slightest regard for the Constitution.

Such an attempt is unworthy of this committee, and it is also unworthy of this House, and the end sought to be obtained will not justify the very crude means that have been adopted in this bill.

It reflects credit upon no one and is an example of legislative audacity that is quite humiliating to anyone who retains any shred of regard for the Constitution.

Maj. Gen. Edward C. Young, formerly in command of the National Guard of Illinois, and the former chairman of the executive committee of the National Guard Association, a graduate of West Point, a former officer of the Army of the United States, a colonel in the Spanish-American War, a prominent business man of the city of Chicago, and a gentleman who has given the best years of his life to the advancement of the interests of the National Guard, points out the following objections to those portions of the Hay bill which affect the National Guard, and I incorporate them as a part of my statement. He says:

The Hay bill fails utterly to provide for an adequate preparedness.

It makes no substantial increase in the Regular Army and would be a positive menace to the National Guard.

Militia legislation up to this date has been based upon the theory that the militia is primarily a State force to be used by the National Government under conditions as specified in the Constitution of the United States. This bill is framed upon the theory that the militia is primarily a national force, the use of which is granted to the State in times of peace.

The bill assumes that Congress has power to organize, arm, and discipline the militia, call it into the service of the United States at any time, or under any conditions, to govern it either when in the service of the State or the United States, to directly train it under command of Regular Army officers, and to provide rules and regulations and conditions for the appointment of the officers. All of which is clearly contrary to the provisions of the Constitution. The power to provide is very different from the power to directly execute.

The bill, therefore, fairly bristles with unconstitutional and impracticable provisions. Among these the following more important ones may be noted:

Sections 36, 37, and 38 provide conditions and limitations for the appointment of officers. The examination to determine qualifications for commission is to be conducted by a board of commissioned officers appointed by the Secretary of War, consisting of officers of the Regular Army or the National Guard. By what constitutional authority can the Secretary of War give an official status to a board of National Guard officers when the National Guard is not in the service of the United States? What authority can a board of Regular Army officers have over the appointment of officers to the National Guard? What right has the Secretary of War to interfere with the States in the appointment of officers when this right is specially reserved to the States by the Constitution?

All of the provisions in relation to the appointment of officers is clearly unconstitutional, and some of the provisions might easily be carried out to the detriment of the orderly government of the State troops. Any officer of the National Guard not acceptable to a board of Army officers, no matter what may have been his previous service or his ability or the desire of the governor of the State to appoint him, could be denied a commission.

Section 39 is of similar character, providing for the dismissal of officers of the National Guard. This section, however, fails to designate the authority for the appointment of the efficiency board. It would probably be claimed by the Secretary of War following the provisions in section 37.

Section 30 provides for the assigning of the National Guard to divisions, brigades, and other tactical units, and the detail of officers from the National Guard or the Regular Army to command such units. These tactical units would undoubtedly have to be made up of the National Guard from different States. The only assumed authority which the officer detailed to command could have would be derived through his detail by the President. This is clearly a question of government. By what authority can the President govern the National Guard except when it is in the service of the United States? What authority can an officer of one State exercise over the National Guard of another State? Indeed, it is a serious question whether any laws governing the National Guard are effective outside of the State to which the National Guard belongs, except, of course, when it is in the service of the United States. The only laws which can govern the National Guard in time of peace are the State laws, and these laws are not operative beyond the limits of the State. It may be contended in this connection that National Guard organizations have taken part in joint encampments under the command of Regular Army officers and National Guard officers of other States. This, however, is purely a question of courtesy, and no attempt has been made to enforce a legal control or government.

Section 54 provides "that the President may call into the service of the United States the National Guard, or any part thereof, to participate in encampments," etc., "for at least 15 days each year." This is clearly unconstitutional, as the militia can not be called into the service of the United States except as provided by the Constitution. Even if constitutional, it would be a dangerous provision, for it might subject the National Guard to unexpected and indefinite service, thereby greatly interfering with their civil affairs. This was the objection to the continental-army scheme. It is even more objectionable here, for in addition to all of the requirements of the State they would be subjected to indefinite service under the National Government. It should be noted that in this section it is proposed to call these organizations into the service of the United States as militia. Attention is directed especially to this, because later on a similar authority, although derived from a different source in the Constitution, is used to transfer the National Guard to the service of the United States in time of war.

Sections 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, and 70 are all unconstitutional, for they assume the right to govern the militia in time of peace and when not in the service of the United States. Discipline, as used in the Constitution, does not mean trial or punishment; it means simply drill or training. Section 65 provides that the President may convene general courts-martial for the trial of members of the National Guard. No limitations are placed upon this, and he could detail an entire court of Regular Army officers. What jurisdiction could such a court have? Here, again, if the provisions were constitutional they would be very dangerous to the National Guard. Every man on trial for his life, his liberty, or his property should have a jury of his peers. Under the above provisions the President of the United States, which means the Secretary of War, which means the Chief of Staff of the Regular Army, could organize a court-martial of Regular Army officers, try an officer of the National Guard, dismiss him from the service, fine him $200, and in lieu of the fine put him in jail for 200 days, and call upon the United States marshal to execute the sentence. This is the limit of injustice and unfairness.

Section 76 is the most dangerous provision in this bill and is the real joker. Two cardinal principles have been insisted upon by the National Guard. First, that the National Guard shall have prior service—that is next in line to the Regular Army; second, that the organizations of the National Guard and the rank of its officers be preserved when the National Guard is taken into the service of the United States, either under a call as militia, as provided by the Constitution, or under a transfer to the United States forces under the power of Congress to raise armies and provide for the national defense. This bill fails completely in both particulars. It provides for a draft of the individual member. The word "draft" is most repugnant in this connection and does not properly express the action to be taken. From the date of the draft all persons stand discharged from the militia. In other words, there are simply so many men with no exact status; all organizations are automatically destroyed, all officers automatically discharged. No matter what may have been the length and efficiency of an officer's service, he finds himself when drafted as naked of power and position as when he first enlisted in the service. The only status given these men is that they are subject to such laws and regulations for the government of the Army of the United States as are applicable to members of the Volunteer Army. Having drafted this body of men, they shall be embodied in organizations corresponding to the Regular Army, or otherwise assigned, as the President may direct. For instance, the President could form a regiment of infantry by taking approximately 50 men from each and every State, irrespective of whether they had been officers or enlisted men in the National Guard. Having constituted this organization, he could then appoint officers to command it from its own members. A former enlisted man might be appointed colonel, and the colonel might remain an enlisted man. Moreover, there is no redress. Even a reserve officer of the Regular Army, who might have had no service whatever except in schools, or perhaps one year in a cadet corps, can not be compelled without his consent to serve in a rank lower than that held by him in the reserve corps.

Immediately upon the draft the Organized Militia, or at least the portion drafted, ceases to exist. It is ended completely. At the conclusion of the national service, even though it might be for a month only, all the officers and men of the National Guard return to the States simply as citizens, without any position or rank.

This bill also fails to provide for priority of service. The President may call into service as many volunteers or as many Army reserves as he may wish before making use of the National Guard. All that the National Guard has accomplished, then, or can accomplish under the provisions of this bill, is to train so many citizens for service. The officer, after many years of study and sacrifice of time, may find himself divested of his rank and humiliated at the time when he may be of service to his country. The purely mechanical work of reorganizing the entire National Guard and appointing all of its officers would involve much confusion and delay. It would be even worse than it was at the beginning of the Spanish-American War.

It might be contended that the President would not go to any unusual extremes nor deal unfairly or unjustly with the National Guard.

We have before us the history of our previous wars and the effect of political influences in the appointment of officers. Unless the law protects the officers of the National Guard, what reason have we for believing that the future will be different from the past? Political influence would certainly not fail to exert itself to the maximum under such a favorable opportunity, when the President alone has the appointment of thousands of officers.

No provision is made in this bill for pensions for members of the National Guard drafted into the military service of the United States.

No provision is made for calling forth the militia under the provisions of the Constitution for the suppression of insurrections and the maintenance of law and order in the execution of the laws of the Union.

The bill, after having indulged in extravagant and unconstitutional provisions, unconsciously recognizes the fact that there is no means for enforcing the same, except to withdraw from the State the financial support of the National Government (see sec. 27). If, therefore, under a most objectionable bill, a State is unable to comply with all of the provisions of this law, then the National Guard of such State will be completely abandoned, except where the State, unaided, can support it.

The appropriations made by Congress are to be apportioned in ratio to the appropriations made by the State. This is wrong in theory and will not work out in practice. The object of national support is to develop and encourage the National Guard, and this assistance is most needed in the States having the least resources. The National Guard should be developed in every State. To withdraw support from the poorer States would ruin the National Guard of such States and would throw the entire organization to the richer sections of the country. A certain portion of the national appropriations should be distributed in proportion to congressional representation, conditioned upon a minimum number which could be readily maintained by the States.

It is a serious question whether the National Guard could be maintained under the provisions of this bill. It is extremely doubtful whether men would voluntarily enter the service under the conditions imposed.

If we are to organize a national defense under a purely volunteer system, it would be much better to leave the National Guard to the voluntary action of the States for training and development in time of peace. A doubtful authority is repugnant to military efficiency and will necessarily lead to confusion and discouragement. The National Guard should be purely a State force in time of peace, developed by the States under liberal aid from the National Government, with proper provisions for its transfer without confusion or delay to the service of the United States.

The Chamberlain bill, as presented to the Senate December 10, 1915, provides for the proper method for transferring the National Guard from the State service to the national service. There are many minor omissions and objections to the proposed Hay bill, but those pointed out should be ample to cause its defeat.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO].

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I have been associated with the National Guard of Pennsylvania for a number of years, and I want to say that I honestly believe that every man who has been a member of that organization since 1903, both enlisted men and officers, believes that he has been up to this time a member of the Army of the United States and subject to call by the President of the United States to do whatever duty may be imposed upon him. I believe that in this bill we have provided an oath of enlistment which covers all of the points which have been raised in this discussion. When a man takes an oath to support and defend the Constitution of the United States and obey the orders of the President of the United States and the orders of the officers appointed over him, and after taking the oath and obligation is placed on the pay roll of the United States Government and is paid by the United States Government, I believe that he is in the service of the United States Government within the meaning of the wording of the Constitution.

There is a distinction made even in the Constitution between service of the United States and actual service, which has been held to mean service during the time of war. We want to keep this in mind here, because we are legislating for an Army in the time of peace and for training them for service in time of war.

The amendment suggested, to my mind, does not make stronger the obligation of the individual in the National Guard to the Federal Government, but weakens it where it says:

> Shall have the status of a Federal soldier within the meaning of section 8, Article I, of the Constitution of the United States, whenever ordered into the service of the United States by the President of the United States.

I take the position that the men in the Organized Militia in the States have already a Federal status. We are paying them for their service as such soldiers, and I believe that we have met every requirement of the Constitution when we have prescribed and laid down the discipline provided in this bill.

Now, it must not be forgotten that in the Army of the United States we deal with the individual entirely when it comes to a matter of discipline. This is also true in the National Guard in relation to the members of the National Guard and the General Government. Hence, the provision which was put in regarding the draft to which there can be no question. In my mind, it will not be necessary to resort to that, because I believe these men, as organizations, as companies, as regiments, and brigades, will gladly answer any call to the colors, but it is a safeguard which may be thought necessary, and when the individual takes this obligation prescribed by this act he enters into the service of the United States, and as an individual has placed himself subject to the call of the President of the United States at any time, I do not believe that it is necessary to in any way encumber this bill with an amendment of this kind. For that reason I shall vote against the amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, many of the difficulties that have been suggested in regard to the State militia as a national force are imaginary. It is true, in a sense, that the Nation can not federalize the State militia; for it can not absorb, it can not monopolize the powers of the State militia with relation to their obligation and service. They are an arm of the State, and as such must fulfill their obligation and duty to their States.

It is true that you can federalize the militia if by that you mean the right to exercise the powers granted to the Government by the Constitution, which makes the militia a national as well as a State organization, with obligations and duties national as well as State. It is, or ought to be, generally understood that every citizen of this country has a dual allegiance, one to the Nation and the other to the State. When the Nation seeks to interfere with the powers of the State, we find that the Constitution says it shall not be done. But when a power is granted by the Constitution to the Nation, then that power is supreme and the obligation and service is due to the Nation and must be fulfilled.

When the militia was organized it was a State institution. It was difficult for the framers of the Constitution to handle the obligation that seemed to be primary with the citizens of that time to the States with the purpose of making an efficient national force that would support the authority and power of the National Government which they were establishing. They made an effort to do this, and in some instances there was a concession made, or an invasion, if you choose to call it, into the powers of the States. For instance, it was given to Congress the power to organize and discipline the militia, a power it did not have until that time. But since the adoption of the Constitution the power of the Nation to organize and discipline the militia has been unquestioned. The States formerly exercised that power and were reluctant to give it up. But that was taken away from them by this provision of the Constitution, and when called into the service of the United States they are subject to its supreme governing authority. For fear that this grant of power might include too much, or be thought to include too much, a reservation was made reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of officers; so that the National Government, so long as the militia remains a State organization and is not called into the service of the United States, can not force upon the States contrary to their wishes any officers of its own selection. But immediately the militia becomes, either by call or by voluntary enlistment, a part of the national forces, it becomes absolutely subject to national authority. Any disposition or assignment of officers or men are within the scope of national authority. They are subject to orders for the betterment of the service or for the strengthening of the Army just as any other part of the national forces are. There need not be, there should not be, any conflict between the powers of the State and that of the Nation.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL].

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment, to my mind, is to serve as a forerunner to a proposition to amend section 76 of this proposed bill by striking out the draft clause. If it is not, the proposed amendment is useless. If it is, and the amendment is agreed to, then you must also strike out the draft clause. As I understand the situation in which we find ourselves to-day, it is a question of law. The question before us is, Can we federalize the National Guard and stay within the Constitution of the United States, both in letter and in spirit? As I read the Constitution of the United States I am convinced that the Constitution intended that the citizen soldiery of the United States should be a State institution and under State control, except when the Nation, as a Nation, needs the citizen soldiery of America, in which event the President has authority to use them in the service and for the Nation's need. It is because of this that this bill has been framed as it is. We have section 34, which prescribes the oath that shall be taken by men who join the National Guard, and we have sections 76 and 77, which prescribe that once a man has voluntarily gone into this National Guard and the Nation needs him, we do not have to order him anywhere, but by the issuance of a demand by the President of the United States he becomes a Federal soldier, and goes to the defense of his country in its hour of need. I hope, therefore, that this amendment will be defeated.

Mr. DALE of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Certainly.

Mr. DALE of New York. I would like to know whether or not Gen. O'Ryan, the adjutant general of the National Guard, did not appear before the committee and urge the proposed amendment to be embodied into the bill?

Mr. CALDWELL. I will say, in answer to that, that Gen. O'Ryan came before the committee and advocated a dual enlistment; that he subsequently returned to New York and sent us a typewritten proposition including the dual enlistment, but that this proposition was taken up in the committee, discussed, and it was decided in the committee, by and with the best legal talent to which the President of the United States could refer this proposition, that this was the proper way to federalize the National Guard [applause], and meet every proposition of Gen. O'Ryan and keep the National Guard a body of citizen soldiery subject to the demand of the people of the United States when needed.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, while the extent of the powers of the Federal Government over the State militia are not as clearly defined as some of us would wish, and while it has been the subject of much argument, I am of the belief myself that this bill does not go beyond the constitutional powers of the Government. I do not exactly understand the position of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD], who spoke with so much force upon this subject, and with whose argument in some respects I agree. As I understand it, he contended that the National Government had no power to provide for court-martial of members of the National Guard.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I am in favor of the amendment. I believe the obligation of the National Guard should go just as far as it can to make it both a State and a Federal force.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I agree with the gentleman there; but what I wish to say, with reference to this matter of court-martial, is that this was the express question involved in the case of Houston against Moore, to which he refers, and in which case it was held that the Federal Government might provide regulations as to the manner and form of court-martial, and that the statutes of the United States in that respect were binding and enforceable.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. That was in time of war, was it not?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It was in time of war; but that did not enter into the question at all, and was not spoken of by the court—was not made the basis of the court's decision in any respect. In this case of Houston against Moore the court said:

> Congress has power to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia; and it is presumable that the framers of the Constitution contemplated a full exercise of all these powers. If Congress had declined to exercise them, it was competent to the State governments to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining of the respective militias in such manner as they might think proper.

But the court went on to say that where Congress had provided the method for the organization and disciplining of the militia those laws were binding upon the respective States; and in this same case the court, referring to the authority of Congress, says that where they have entered into the service of the United States there is no question about the authority of Congress. There might have been some question under that particular law as to when they entered into the service, and right here is where I agree with the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO], who said that this bill provided, as it seems to me it clearly does, for members of the militia entering into the service of the United States; and where they have so entered into the service of the United States, under all of the decisions of the Supreme Court, there is not the slightest question about the authority of Congress to control them.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, it is apparent that the proposed amendment is intended to and does to a very great extent federalize the National Guard. I shall not discuss the proposition from a constitutional standpoint. I am in full accord with the argument by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD] along this line.

My purpose in detaining the House for a few moments is to resent some insinuations or intimations that the present National Guard throughout the country is not sufficiently patriotic to respond to the call of the President in time of war. The binding oath incorporated in the proposed amendment is for the apparent purpose of lashing the guardsman to the mast in such manner that he can not escape performing his duty as a soldier under any and all circumstances.

Section 34 of the present bill prescribes as follows:

> SEC. 34. That hereafter all men enlisting for service in the National Guard shall sign an enlistment contract which shall include an obligation to bear true faith and allegiance to the United States, to support the Constitution thereof, and to obey the lawful orders of the President of the United States and the officers appointed over the men so enlisting.

It is hardly conceivable that an American citizen subscribing to this contract and obligation would not faithfully carry out the same to the limit.

The present National Guard is composed of men who are truly patriotic, and I believe that all future National Guardsmen will be equally so, and that this enlistment contract and obligation will be amply sufficient without the ironclad oath specifically mentioned in the proposed amendment to bring these men promptly into service whenever the President of the United States desires them to do so.

Mr. Chairman, some years ago it was my good fortune to be connected with the National Guard of Minnesota, and for four years I had the honor of being a captain of what was then known as Company I, Second Regiment Minnesota National Guard. This company consisted of about 75 young men. They were the sons of farmers, merchants, doctors, and practically from all vocations of life. They were of the best blood of all nationalities. They were the sons of the sturdy and industrious Scandinavian, German, Irish, French, and other parentage, each vying with the other in patriotism and all anxious to obtain that efficiency which military discipline requires to perfect them as soldiers in case of our country's need. For several years previous thereto and since many young men have belonged to this particular company. As vacancies occurred additions followed, and at the present time I verily believe that there are a large number—at least 100—who have had military training in this particular company and who still remain in the vicinity; that in case our country called for their service these men would respond with alacrity, and would not be found wanting in any respect. At the present time this company has been reorganized and is now known as Company K, Second Regiment, and much new blood has been added.

As evidence of the loyalty and patriotism of the National Guard of this country and their willingness to serve the Nation I desire to read as part of my remarks a short article from the St. Peter Herald, a local newspaper published in St. Peter, Minn., of date March 17, 1916.

RECRUITS JOIN LOCAL COMPANY—PROSPECTS OF ACTIVE SERVICE HAS EFFECT ON ENLISTMENTS.

Prospects of active service along the Mexican border or in Mexico itself are having an effect upon the enlistments in Company K, Second Regiment. At the regular weekly drill of the company last Monday evening five recruits came forward, and Capt. Frank Magner is receiving numerous inquiries.

"Should this company be called out," said Capt. Magner, "it has 65 men available for immediate service. These could be assembled and leave for the mobilization camp at Fort Snelling within 24 hours. However, we have no means of knowing whether the war department would require companies of 106 or 150 men. Should the latter number be wanted the second lieutenant of the company, who is the recruiting officer for war, might be detained in St. Peter a week or 10 days.

"So far as arms and equipments are concerned, the company is well supplied. To all intents and purposes it is on the same footing as an organization of the same kind in the Regular Army. During the winter months a considerable amount of equipment that was lacking has been received from the military storekeeper, and in this particular the company is ready for active service in the field."

Under the state law the maximum peace strength of the company is 76 officers and men. It is the purpose of Capt. Magner and his lieutenants to recruit beyond peace strength so as to be prepared for emergencies.

Activity along the Mexican border is of interest here from the further fact that three troops of the Thirteenth Cavalry bore the brunt of the surprise attack on Douglas, Ariz., last week. For many years Col. F. O. Johnson, a former St. Peter man, was lieutenant colonel of that regiment. After being promoted to colonel he was on duty with the Thirteenth until the first of the present year, when he was placed in command of the military post at Columbus Barracks, Ohio.

Mr. Chairman, it will be observed that this company, and I do not think they are an exception, have weekly drills, and from my knowledge, aside from the statement contained in this article, they are a well-drilled and soldierly body of young men, well equipped in all ways, and the officers are of the best. I can not doubt, and no gentleman on this floor can doubt, the sincerity, the loyalty, the earnestness, or the patriotism of any who are connected with this organization.

All hail to the National Guard, and in case of war, either of invasion or otherwise, when the President and the Congress determine that our cause is just these men will rush to arms in the defense of our country and its honor to the utmost. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, this item involves the question of Federal relations, the conflict growing out of our double sovereignty, sovereignty in the Federal Government, and sovereignty in the States; the conflict between the principle of national prerogative and the rights of the State. The Constitution prescribes specifically for both of these and we accordingly have an establishment under the Federal Government, the Regular Army, and an establishment under the State government, a National Guard, made up of the militia defined by the Constitution. These two are quite distinct, both in constitutional inception and historical application. My one fear has been our constitutional freedom of utilizing the National Guard as a Federal body—that is, whether the State organization can be fully utilized as a national body without interfering with its constitutional purpose. I have been told by those whose judgment I admire and respect that the conflict does not necessarily exist; that this phase of the bill has received the widest consideration and approval of the committee. However, I see this differentiation in the constitutional provisions covering the defense features, and I know that it has been felt in our history. In 1812 the militia was called and it did not respond in several States. My own State of Ohio, when Hull called for the militia to cross over into Canada, refused to fully respond to the call. I believe that this amendment will give a status where there will be less doubt as to the status of the National Guard in our Federal system. It is not a question with me whether the National Guard will be effective. I have no doubt but that it will be. It is not a question as to the relative discipline of the Federal Army and the National Guard. We all admit that the acme of discipline will be found in the Regular rather than the Volunteer service. But the facts are, gentlemen, that the country will not stand at this time for a large Federal Army that is not made up of the citizen soldiery, and we might as well face that situation. I believe here is a proposal that will assist in the needed organization, and why not adopt an amendment that will clear our right to federalize the citizen soldiery and under proper conditions make a Federal Army? For that reason I shall without hesitation vote for the amendment that puts the definition of the Constitution here in the determination of the National Guard, and I think it ought to be adopted without hesitation. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. KAHN. How much time does the gentleman yield back?

The CHAIRMAN. Two minutes.

Mr. KAHN. I yield that two minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, in section 34 of this bill it is provided—

> SEC. 34. That hereafter all men enlisting for service in the National Guard shall sign an enlistment contract which shall include an obligation to bear true faith and allegiance to the United States, to support the Constitution thereof, and to obey the lawful orders of the President of the United States and the officers appointed over the men so enlisting.

It is not provided in that section that the oath of enlistment shall be uniform throughout the United States. This amendment of mine does provide that every man in every State of the whole Union who signs an enlistment paper shall sign the same oath. It does little more than this, except to declare a Federal status which, it is believed by other members of the committee, is created by this bill. Mr. Chairman, it surely clears the situation and makes uniform throughout the country what we have tried to do in section 34 of the bill. It may add little or nothing, so far as federalization is concerned, if we give to section 34 the meaning that it has been stated here that section is intended to convey. If there be any doubt, however, as to the effect of sections 34 and 35 this amendment will aid in removing the doubt. At any rate it will produce uniformity throughout the country in the very important matter of the enlistment contract and the officers' oath of office.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman from Connecticut seems to admit that section 34 is sufficient to cover the proposition. Mr. Chairman, the range of discussion on the amendment of the gentleman has gone into the question of the constitutionality of the provisions of this bill which deal with the National Guard. If anybody has done the committee the honor to read its report, there is contained in that report a very extensive discussion of whether or not the provisions contained in this bill are constitutional, and in the minds of the committee it seemed that the reasons given in the report were sufficient to convince anyone that we had complied with the Constitution and had not in any way violated it by any of the provisions of this act.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD] seemed to think that this law provides for taking away from the governors of the States the power of appointing the officers. It does not do anything of that sort.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Will the gentleman kindly yield for a question?

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Does it not prescribe some limitations by the Federal authority and leave those limitations entirely to the Federal authority, under which the governor must appoint?

Mr. HAY. It does; and unquestionably under the Constitution it has the right to do it. The Judge Advocate General of the Army, who does not think, I believe, that we can federalize the National Guard, admits that one of the powers which Congress has is that we can prescribe the qualifications of the officers of the National Guard. But he says that, while Congress can do that, it has not the power to enforce it. Well, nobody who is a lawyer will contend that the Constitution confers powers upon Congress which Congress has not the right to enforce. If those powers have been conferred upon Congress, unquestionably Congress has the right by law to enforce whatever power has been conferred upon it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does not the same section of the Constitution give the Congress the additional power to enact the laws to carry into force the powers given it over the State militia?

Mr. HAY. Undoubtedly. Now, as to the constitutionality of these provisions I want to say further that, under the Constitution, Congress has the power to arm, organize, and discipline and, under rules prescribed by Congress, to train the National Guard; and in this bill we have undertaken to exercise those powers which have been conferred upon Congress. And we believe that under the provisions of this bill we have made for the country a uniform system to control the National Guard, not to control the National Guard of New York in one way and the National Guard of Illinois in another way, but that all the States shall conform to the organization, discipline, and training as provided for in this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Do the provisions of the bill make it absolutely compulsory upon every National Guard in every State of the Union to come within the provisions of the bill?

Mr. HAY. It does, unquestionably; and it would not be worth the snap of my finger if it did not.

Mr. MADDEN. So it is not within the power of the governor of the State or anybody else in the State, or the National Guard of the State, to say it will take exceptions to the provisions of the bill.

Mr. HAY. It is not.

Mr. MADDEN. And it is optional with any power of the State to say that it will take advantage of the appropriations made in this bill for the State militia, but, on the other hand, it is absolutely compulsory in every instance to come under the provisions of the bill?

Mr. HAY. Yes; if they accept the pay under this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Are they not compelled to accept the pay?

Mr. HAY. No; they are not compelled to accept the pay; but every man who enlists in the National Guard, when he joins and accepts the pay, must come under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. As a matter of fact, if he joins the National Guard he accepts the pay, does he not?

Mr. HAY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MADDEN. And one follows the other?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. So that when a citizen of a State becomes a member of the National Guard he comes under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, in so far as the Government regulates the conduct of the National Guard?

Mr. HAY. That is true.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it possible, under the terms of this bill, for any State organization, if the State authorities so decree, to remain outside the pale of the provisions of this act?

Mr. HAY. It is possible for any organization to remain out of the provisions of this act if they do not choose to accept the pay; but they can not get the pay unless they come in under the provisions of the act.

Mr. STAFFORD. And it rests with themselves to determine whether they shall come under the provisions of this act?

Mr. HAY. It does to that extent.

Mr. TILSON. I would like to ask the gentleman to state in a word what is his objection to having a uniform oath for officers and a uniform oath of enlistment for men all over the United States?

Mr. HAY. I have no objection to having a uniform oath for officers and men, but we have it already in the bill. You have it already in section 34. That section provides the oath to be taken by the enlisted men, and in a previous section for the oath to be taken by a commissioned officer.

But what I want to address myself to now is the repeated statement by those who are not in favor of federalizing the National Guard, and say that you have 48 different States, 48 different armies, and 48 different commanders of those armies. Under the provisions of this bill that is not true. We here make uniform the entire National Guard of the United States, and provision is made in this bill that when it is necessary for them to come into the service of the United States they shall come.

I know that some members of the National Guard object to the word "draft"; but in order to meet the requirements of the Constitution, which provides that you can only use the National Guard to repel invasion, to suppress insurrection, and to execute the laws of the Union, it was necessary to frame some provision under which in time of war the National Guard could be sent wherever the President thought it was necessary to send them, whether in the country or out of the country.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HAY. Yes; in just a moment. In order to do that it is provided in section 77—I believe it is—of this bill that when the Congress authorizes in time of war the raising of land forces beyond those of the Regular Army the President may draft the whole National Guard of the country into the service of the United States.

Mr. MADDEN. That means nothing more than calling them, does it?

Mr. HAY. It means that the Congress has the power to draft and to give that power to the President over these troops that we are paying in time of peace. And I want to say to the gentleman that when a man joins the National Guard and goes into the National Guard he volunteers to go to war under the provisions of this bill. When he joins he knows he is going to be drafted. He knows he is going in, and he volunteers to do it. When he goes in in time of peace he knows he has to go if he still remains a member of the National Guard when the time comes, so that the word "draft" ought not to be looked upon by the members of the National Guard in any invidious sense. It simply means that these people can be used when it is necessary for them to be used. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. If the bill goes into effect as it is written is there any possibility of a conflict between the Federal Government and the States in calling for the militia?

Mr. HAY. None whatever.

Mr. FESS. You deal with them as individuals and not as State organizations?

Mr. HAY. That is true. The men who framed the Constitution of this country, the men who were present when the debates were had upon the ratification of the Constitution, believed that they were writing into the Constitution a provision with regard to the militia which made the militia a national force and not a State force.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BARKLEY. Has the gentleman any doubt, under the terms of this bill, as the National Guard would be organized, disciplined, and controlled in time of war, that the President of the United States might order this National Guard to any quarter of the world where their services might be needed?

Mr. HAY. None whatever. As I was about to say, Patrick Henry, James Madison, Alexander Hamilton, James Monroe, and other men who framed the Constitution believed that they were providing in the militia a national force, which could be made an actual national force, and could be used for national purposes. Patrick Henry opposed the adoption of the Constitution upon that ground—that the States were giving up their control over the militia. Mr. Madison, in one of his messages to Congress, stated that Congress ought to call out for training the National Guard at the public expense, thereby showing that he believed that it was a National and not a State force.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KAHN. This bill, as I understand it, attempts for the first time in the history of the country to prescribe for the organization and the discipline of the National Guard by the Congress of the United States?

Mr. HAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KAHN. And the Secretary of War appeared before our committee and stated as his opinion that we had the right to draft any particular class of citizens as against any other class?

Mr. HAY. Yes. We could draft red-headed men or blue-eyed men if we wanted to. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. And bald-headed men? [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. HAY. I did not say anything about bald-headed men.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HAY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Let me put a concrete case to the gentleman. Suppose a governor of a State had called out the militia to suppress a very serious riot, and on the same day an invading force was landed in the country. Would the President of the United States then have the right to call on the force which was in process of quelling the riot to suppress that invasion?

Mr. HAY. Undoubtedly; the authority to do that would be paramount over the authority of the governor to use that force in quelling the riot.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Would not the language of the oath contained in the amendment serve the purpose of the draft that the gentleman speaks of?

Mr. HAY. It would not; and I am glad that the gentleman called my attention to that feature of the amendment. The bill provides that when the National Guard is ordered into the service of the United States, in order to make it constitutional that these troops can be called into the service of the United States in time of war it is necessary to divorce them from their character as militia, because the Constitution says you can not call out the militia except for certain purposes. Therefore this law provides that when they are drafted by the President they shall cease to be militia, and in that way we get around the constitutional objection to using them outside of the country, and that oath would not accomplish what we think should be accomplished.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Would it be necessary, under the draft provided for, to recommission all the officers by the President of the United States?

Mr. HAY. I think it would be; but, of course, that could be done. That could be all ready. This fear of some gentlemen that they are not going to be taken into the service in time of war, that they are not going to be given their commissions, is, in my judgment, a vain fear, because when war comes and these troops are called upon they have to be officered by somebody, and no President would discharge the officers who have been with the troops and who have, as it were, raised them, and who under the provisions of this bill would be capable officers. He would undoubtedly commission the officers who had been with them all the time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. MANN. Under the law could the President commission a captain under a certain age or a major or a colonel?

Mr. HAY. I think so. There is not anything in this law which prevents the President from commissioning an officer in time of war of any age that I know of.

Mr. MANN. Is there anything in the law that permits it?

Mr. HAY. I do not know whether there is anything in the law that permits it, but I know that there is nothing in the law that prohibits it.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yeld?

Mr. HAY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HELM. Do the men who are called out in the militia under the provisions of this bill become an integral part of the Regular Army, or do they become a part of the Army provided for in the act of April 25, 1914?

Mr. HAY. They would not be a part of either. They would be a distinct body of troops, drafted into the service of the United States under the provisions of this law.

Mr. HELM. They would be neither Regulars nor Volunteers?

Mr. HAY. They would not. They would be paid as Regulars are paid; but they would not be Volunteers, because they would not volunteer, and they would not be in the Regular Army, because they never enlisted in the Regular Army.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. I listened to the remarks of the gentleman in reply to the question that was asked by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] concerning the calling in of the National Guard as organizations.

Mr. HAY. There is no provision here for calling them in as organizations.

Mr. EMERSON. I am going to offer an amendment to section 25, providing that they shall be called in as organizations. Is the gentleman going to object to that?

Mr. HAY. I certainly am.

Mr. EMERSON. Why?

Mr. HAY. I will tell the gentleman that when he comes to offer his amendment; but he could not hurt this act more than by securing the adoption of such an amendment.

Mr. EMERSON. I should like to know why?

Mr. HAY. I think that so far as the Constitution is concerned we have in this act provided for every conceivable objection that can be made from a constitutional standpoint, and I have not yet heard anybody who has spoken on that feature of the bill advance a single proposition going to show that this is against the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, may I now offer an amendment to come in as a separate section, section 23a?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add a new section after section 23, to be designated section 23a, and which is to read as follows:

"That no member of the National Guard shall be called upon to perform duty in connection with the suppression of strikes."

Mr. HAY. I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LONDON. Will the Chair hear me on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. Of course the Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I believe this amendment is germane. You are now for the first time bringing the National Guard within the direct jurisdiction of Congress. You are reorganizing the National Guard. The bill is called a bill to promote the efficiency of the Military Establishment. It is my belief that you will destroy the efficiency of the Military Establishment if you permit the National Guard, which from now on will be under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, to be used as a strike-breaking agency, as has been repeatedly done at the behest of corporations in a number of States. It is my contention that this amendment is clearly within the purview of this bill. Nothing is more destructive of the respect which the people should entertain for their defenders than the use of the armed forces of the country for the suppression of strikes, a rather primitive method used to crush the resistance of organized labor. The violence resorted to by those in authority must bring about violence on the part of the under dog. Violence breeds violence. Hatred breeds hatred. The use of physical force on the part of the organized troops of the United States breeds necessarily the use of physical force on the part of those whom they are called on to intimidate. I believe the amendment is in order. If the National Guard continues to be used for the suppression of strikes, you will destroy all respect for the National Guard. People will look upon it as a strike-breaking agency, as they look to-day upon the National Guard of the various States. They will refuse to join the National Guard, and the only personnel that you will gather will come from the bank clerks, the corporation lawyers, the men who look with contempt upon the great masses of the people. You will help to intensify the hatred which exists between the classes and the masses. You will help to widen the gulf between the poor and the rich, between the strong and the weak.

Mr. Chairman, I respectfully submit that the proposed amendment is in order.

Mr. KEATING. Before the Chair rules, permit me to call his attention to section 26 of this bill, and particularly to the proviso—

Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed as limiting the rights of the States and Territories to the use of the National Guard within their respective borders in time of peace.

It seems to me that those who put that proviso in the bill had in mind the power in this bill to limit the use of the National Guard; and that is what the gentleman from New York is seeking to do with his amendment. And so strong was the belief of the members of this committee that we had the power to say that the National Guard should or should not be used for certain purposes that they placed that proviso in section 26.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that there has ever been a legal definition given of the word "strike." No definition of that word has ever been given by any court or by any arm of the Government. The Chair does not think the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York is germane, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LONDON. May I ask the Chairman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LONDON. Has not the word "strike" come to mean a certain definite thing—the simultaneous quitting of work by a number of employees? Has it not acquired a certain definite meaning in the English language, and is not every word of the English language a part of the legal language?

The CHAIRMAN. In the popular mind, perhaps, but not by any opinion of a court or any responsible Government agency.

Mr. LONDON. I know; but have not the courts for more than a quarter of a century dealt with strikes and strikers? Have they not been issuing decrees in strikes? The word "strike" has a definite, specific, certain meaning to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. In the popular mind, perhaps, but not by any legal definition. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 24. That the Vice President of the United States; the officers, judicial and executive, of the Government of the United States and of the several States and Territories; the Members and officers of each House of Congress; persons in the military or naval service of the United States; customhouse clerks; persons employed by the United States in the transmission of the mail; artificers and workmen employed in the armories, arsenals, and navy yards of the United States; pilots; mariners actually employed in the sea service of any citizen or merchant within the United States; and all persons who because of religious beliefs are exempted by the laws of the respective States and Territories shall be exempt from militia duty without regard to age.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] a question in relation to a section that has been passed, section 22. It says:

That the militia of the United States shall consist of all able-bodied male citizens of the United States, and of all other able-bodied males who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States.

Is there any purpose in that language, except to give such residents of the country a right to enlist in the National Guard? In other words, is there any claim of the right to exercise any power of compulsion——

Mr. HAY. No.

Mr. BENNET. It simply offers the privilege to those who have declared their intention?

Mr. HAY. It is the usual language used in bills of this character.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of asking a question of the chairman of the committee in reference to the language used in the bill on page 40. I want to get the gentleman's construction of this language. In line 11:

One year after the passage of this act the Medical Reserve Corps, as now constituted by law, shall cease to exist. Members thereof may be commissioned in the officers' reserve corps, subject to the provisions of this act, or may be honorably discharged from the service.

Does the gentleman understand that that will permit members of the Medical Reserve Corps to enlist in the Medical Corps without any further examination?

Mr. HAY. I told the gentleman this morning I thought so, but I do not. I think they would have to come in under the provisions of this act, which provides for an examination.

Mr. HAMLIN. Does not the gentleman think that these members of the reserve corps, who have had years of experience in the Army, ought to be permitted to come in without examination?

Mr. HAY. I do not think that any difference should be made between them and anybody else.

Mr. HAMLIN. There is this difference: A young man just out of a medical school would perhaps be able to stand a better examination than some practicing surgeon who has been out of school 6, 8, or 10 years, but, having had experience in the Army, the older man would be very much more competent to perform the service required by the Government than would the young man without experience.

Mr. HAY. This is not a competitive examination; it is an examination to inform the War Department whether or not the applicant should be in the service.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Under the existing law the officers of the medical department can not be promoted unless they take another examination, and they do not find any hardship in that.

Mr. HAMLIN. I admit that; I am simply asking for information.

Mr. HAY. It is not a competitive examination; it is a qualifying examination.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 25. That, except as otherwise specifically provided herein, the organization of the National Guard, including the composition of all units thereof, shall be the same as that which is or may hereafter be prescribed for the Regular Army, subject in time of peace to such general exceptions as may be authorized by the Secretary of War.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by substituting for the period on line 16, a semicolon and adding the following words: "Provided, That when ordered into the active service of the United States the National Guard shall be taken as organized, by regiments, brigades, divisions, or independent and separate organizations, as the quota of each State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or major fraction thereof, may require, including all regimental, brigade, and division staff officers authorized by law and regulations for corresponding units of the Regular Army.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I have not more of a record, like some of these gentlemen have had, but it was my misfortune not to have taken part in any military proceeding or to have been a member of any military school or a member of the National Guard. I realize that bullets are no respecter of persons, and it would be my misfortune, if I got to the front, to be the first one shot. But I have a good ancestry along this line. I do take my hat off, however, to a man who goes to defend the flag of his country and the cause it represents. They can talk all they choose about the Regular Army and what the Regular Army does; the fact remains, gentlemen, that when danger threatens your land, when the invading force is on your soil, the men that are going to the front to defend this country in time of danger and trouble are the volunteer, patriotic, loyal men of this country who go in it for principle and not for pay. [Applause.]

Therefore I believe that these men who have labored in the National Guard, many of them being years in the service, training with the men, drilling with them marching with them, having spent the time that they have in the armory and in the encampment, are the men who should carry them on the field of battle in time of danger. If you are going to call on them, if you are going to draft them—draft men who are ready to go—I resent the word "draft"—but if you are going to call them in, call them as organizations. Every man in the State of Ohio volunteered his services with the National Guard in the War with Spain, and the only men that did not go were those who were physically disabled. I resent anything that is said against the National Guard, although I am not a member of it. If the President of the United States should issue a call for the National Guard to go to Mexico, every military organization, every member of the National Guard of every State of the Union would be on the firing line to defend our flag and carry it in triumph out of Mexico, as Gen. Scott did back in the forties. [Applause.]

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, like the gentleman from Ohio, who has just taken his seat, coming from loyal Pennsylvania, I want to say to this House that that word "draft" is odious and will be resented. It is a well-known fact that throughout the history of this country, on every occasion when loyalty was necessary, Pennsylvania responded without a draft. In its conflict during the Civil War 500,000 soldiers came from Pennsylvania. My friends, I want to say to you, as was said by the gentleman who just preceded me, that in any hour of trial the draft will not be needed in Pennsylvania.

I would like any gentleman to tell me why these men who have been trained, as some of them have been, from the ranks up to colonels and brigadier generals in the National Guard of Pennsylvania, would not be capable and ought not to be taken in as is provided in the amendment. I insist that it would be manifestly unjust to those officers in the great States of Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and all the rest of them, to say by this bill that the men who are trained and have come up as I have seen them are to be shelved. We do not ask for them pay without service. They are not officers of the National Guard simply to strut around in gold lace. We furnish fighting men, and we do not ask merely for consideration, but for opportunity, and we insist that this is a just amendment, and I sincerely hope that it will be adopted.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I think every man in this House, and I am sure every man on the committee, contemplated exactly the same spirit of patriotic purpose and loyalty and willingness to sacrifice upon the part of the individual soldier of the National Guard, the organized or unorganized militia, in time of war for the defense of the country that have been so glowingly set forth in the remarks of the two gentlemen who preceded me. This amendment does not present a question of whether these men will be willing to go to war or not, it does not present a question whether they are fit individually to go or not. It does, however, present the question whether when they are once out before the enemy their organizations will be such as, approved by the best military strategists and scientists, will make them capable of protecting themselves against the enemy and protecting themselves against themselves. Military organization is altogether necessary before valor and patriotism, and the spirit of sacrifice can accomplish anything. One of the great problems that has hitherto been associated with any attempt to maintain citizen soldiery anywhere has been the inevitable tendency to develop something like a top-heavy administrative régime, filled up with too many high-titled men in authority over a disproportionate quantity of men who are actually going to do the fighting. Not only that, but there has always grown up, as there inevitably does under the best and most favoring circumstances, a disposition to subdivide and distribute this organization in many ways, so that when the time of peril comes, when the crisis and test are at hand, all those splendid military forces, all that splendid military spirit, as represented in the personnel of the organization, can not be so effectively coordinated that the enemy will get trouble out of it. In some respects it makes it more of a hindrance to the organization's own efficiency than anything else. The purpose of the original text was so to order that when all these patriots individually got into the service they would be organized for the service on exactly the same lines that have been laid down by military experience for generations.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call the attention of the committee to Rule XIX, which provides:

When a motion or proposition is under consideration a motion to amend and a motion to amend that amendment shall be in order, and it shall also be in order to offer a further amendment by way of substitute, to which one amendment may be offered, but which shall not be voted on until the original matter is perfected, but either may be withdrawn before amendment or decision is had thereon.

The Chair is desirous of enforcing the rule in so far as is possible and practicable.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment. It is just as well that we do not wait until war breaks out to discuss these questions of the constitutionality of the draft. If there is any clause in this whole law that I agree to, it is that one for the draft. At the outbreak of the Spanish War, what happened? You could not draft the militia, so you had to enlist the men, all as individuals in the United States Volunteers.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman please wait. When the Spanish War broke out our National Guard organizations could not be incorporated into the United States Volunteers as organizations. The result was that those individuals who did not wish to enlist as volunteers just dropped out. Those who wished to do so, enlisted in the United States service, vacancies were filled by recruits, and the organizations were then reorganized on their former lines and largely with their former officers. That is what is meant when gentlemen say that in the Spanish War every National Guardsman from his particular State volunteered. What happened in the Spanish War? Sixteen States of the Union failed to fill their entire quota. At the time the war was finished there were 16 States of the Union which had not filled their entire quota. Let us see what you are proposing to do when you get right down to it with this proposition of bringing in the militia by organizations. We shall have major generals weighing 300 pounds—and I can not imagine anything more wicked than to put an army under one of those major generals. I do not mean Maj. Gen. O'Ryan, of the State of New York, because he is a real soldier, and he does not weigh 300 pounds.

If you adopt this amendment we shall be forced in case of war to take into the national service in the first line all brigades or divisions which might be formed in the various States. We must incorporate into the first line every militia organization, no matter how badly it misfits. Let me invite your attention to the militia record of last year. The Chief of Staff of the United States Army on October 15, 1915, in his annual report, pages 31 and 32, says that out "of a strength of 91,570 men armed with the rifle, only 49,652, or 54 per cent, attended target practice during the year."

Listen to this: Only 77,558 out of 120,693 enlisted men in the militia attended the summer camps of instruction last year. This fact also appears in the Chief of Staff's report.

The proposed amendment would bring incompetent militia generals into the National Army of the first line in time of war. I have been a militiaman myself, and I know what I am talking about. I was in the Spanish War, and I saw incompetent volunteer brigadier generals in command of thousands of men. If that amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON] is adopted, you will go far toward getting a thoroughly inefficient Army in time of war.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I believe if this amendment be not adopted that you will have very great difficulty in getting any kind of an Army at all through the National Guard. What incentive will there be for a man to become a captain of one of these companies? What incentive will there be for a man to become a colonel of one of these regiments? What incentive will there be for a man to take any of the offices that will be necessary in the formation and organization and the drill and the perfection of this branch of the Army? Are these men to give their patriotism only as drill masters? Are they to give the best of their lives and their time for the purpose of making soldiers, and then when the time comes to show their patriotism by the discharge of their duty on the field to be denied that privilege? I want to say to you that if you are going to make this National Guard the strong arm of the Army you must give it encouragement all along the line.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. GORDON. How are you going to impair the constitutional provision which authorizes the President as commander in chief of the militia when called into the service of the United States? How are you going to lessen that by act of Congress?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not propose to lessen it, and it will not be lessened by the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. GORDON. Then it does not amount to anything.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It does amount to much, for I dare say the President of the United States as Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States is as much interested, and more, in having an army that is in accord from the top down to the bottom than anyone else. Suppose you take a company in my town or in your town or in anybody else's town that has spent years in drilling under efficient men who have given their time day in and day out, week in and week out, and year in and year out in perfecting that company, and when the time comes to be called in defense of their country they are stripped of their officers, and new men strangers to them put over them. You would resent it as an individual, I would resent it, and any self-respecting man would resent it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman, I dare say, has taken into consideration that this paragraph as it stands in the bill is not intended to disturb the organization of the line. It is directed to the tactical organization that may be constituted, and if the gentleman will search the question of tactical organization he will see the difference in the present organizations that——

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. But what is the objection to taking the companies as organized—take the regiment as organized? That is the only purpose of this amendment. It is to make certain what is uncertain. If what you say is in this bill, and if that is the intent and purpose of it, there can be no objection to the adoption of this amendment, it seems to me, in bringing about that very result.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. GARDNER. This amendment affects major and brigadier generals, that is all——

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. What is that?

Mr. GARDNER. This does not affect anybody except brigadier generals and major generals of the National Guard.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Oh, yes; it affects more than that. This amendment provides the organization shall be taken as it is in the State. That would include company organization, would include the regimental organization, and include the brigade organization; and why should it not? I disagree with the gentleman from Massachusetts that these men in these several States that are called major generals or called brigadier generals are tin soldiers. That was not the experience during the Civil War. As I understand, some of the greatest generals we had in the Army were what the gentleman would now denominate tin soldiers.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARDNER. No, indeed; the major generals and brigadier generals who came from the militia with that rank were not so prominent in the Civil War. The brigadier generals and major generals of Volunteers who attained prominence were mostly those who came up from low rank.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I for one believe that there is enough patriotism in the United States among the citizenry, that there is enough personal valor in the hearts of those citizens, that if they could be welded together into an efficient military organization they could fight, as our Speaker has so often aptly expressed it "a world in arms." I think it is the purpose of this House to-day, and in all the days that this bill has been considered, to have just one viewpoint, and that is the efficiency of the Regular Army and of the reserve; and I think that if the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio should be adopted it would be for the exact inefficiency of the entire service of the National Guard.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will in a minute——

Mr. EMERSON. Just tell us how.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will try to do so. We all know that it is valuable to the extreme that the officers be efficient from a military standpoint. We all know that many of the National Guard officers to-day, the great bulk of them, are of that kind. We do not need, however, to close our eyes to the fact that to-day many men who have commissions in the National Guard of the respective States are there because they were popular with their men and not because of their military efficiency. I think, for one, that if the National Guard is to be made the instrumentality which it should be, every man securing a commission should secure it only on his military efficiency, and that is the method provided for in the bill.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. GARDNER. And is it not true that general officers of the National Guard are generally not elected even by their men but by the officers?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I was just coming to that. This is, further, an extreme step. There are some of the National Guard officers of the country, particularly the general and staff officers, who are politicians rather than military men, and I say that, having mighty good friends among the lot, but I, as a soldier, would not want to go out on the firing line led by one of those men. I would be perfectly willing to go out led by a captain, by a lieutenant, by a sergeant, or by a corporal, if he had military training and some military sense, but I would not want to be led by a man who had a lot of gold shoulder straps and no other military service than sitting in his swivel chair——

Mr. MORRISON. Is not that true of the officers of the Regular Army?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It is not true of the officers of the Regular Army, everyone of whom has been drilled in the handling of men in the field, who has served his full period in the heat of the sun, in the stress of the storm, and in all the hardships of practical Army life. So, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this would strike a vital blow at the efficiency of the National Guard as a military instrumentality if we shall handicap the President of the United States, when he calls that guard into service, by telling him he has got to take these officers by and large, secured any way and every way, give them a commission, and place them in command.

And one thing further: It has always been the experience of the country that when war is at hand it is not advisable to send all of the National Guard of one State to one place. The State of New York, the State of Pennsylvania, the State of Illinois, my own State, and other States have 3 or 4, 5, 10, or 20 regiments each. If you are going to adopt this amendment, it will be necessary to send them by brigades and divisions, which would be inexpedient from any military standpoint. Why, the Second Wisconsin was part of the Iron Brigade, one of the most historic and splendid military organizations that ever marched under our flag. Another part of the Iron Brigade came from another State and another part from still another. The Battle of Bull Run, the first battle of the Civil War, was fought by single regiments, coming from States all the way from Minnesota to New England. It is not ever possible, and certainly not proper, to put into a single army all the National Guard from a single State, but which would be necessary if the gentleman's amendment be adopted.

Mr. EMERSON. I would like to inquire of the gentleman if it is not a fact that at Bull Run the entire Regular Army force of the United States was on the Union side, and they did the fastest running, as the gentleman from Texas has stated?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is not true. I will tell the gentleman the truth. There were two organizations that stood last upon the battle field. Next to the last was the First Minnesota, every man standing 6 feet or better, recruited from the prairies of the West, an organization that wrote the most brilliant page in all the annals of citizen soldiers; that fought in every battle from Bull Run to Gettysburg. On that last historic field they, a single regiment, were ordered to charge an army. The world knows the story of that charge. When the carnage ceased only 47 men were standing, but they had stopped an army. In a whirlwind of glory that organization disappeared. Such was one of the two bodies of men defending Pickett's battery in its advanced position, and one that was slow to leave the field. The last body of men to leave, and in leaving they fought stubbornly, step by step, and saved a more complete annihilation of the Union forces, was the body of Regulars under Gen. Ayers, who fought and retreated in good order like a veteran fighting machine. They never ran a step. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it is unnecessary for the gentleman's amendment to be adopted, even to secure the things that some gentlemen have asked for. All line officers of the National Guard are practically certain to be taken as such with the men. They are under this bill to be selected for efficiency, and the President will, of course, keep them with their organizations. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me it is very easy to answer the suggestions that have been made that the failure to adopt this amendment means to deprive the officers of the National Guard of any incentive, and that we are asking them to work through the years in peace times and that when war time comes they are to be disregarded. We are not doing anything of the kind. But we are saying that the test of their appointment in time of war, when they are called into the service of their country by the National Government, shall not be the fact that they hold an office under the State militia, but shall be the fact of their efficiency. In other words, if they train and properly learn to command the militia, their efficiency will guarantee, and properly guarantee, them command when war comes. If they are not fit to stand the test of efficiency, we ought not to have them in position of command. [Applause.] And that is the whole of the proposition.

Now, all of us have State pride; all of us like to talk about the boys at home; all of us like to speak about our militia, particularly as most of them are voters, but the fact remains that the average militia officer, as we have known him, is not the competent officer you ought to have in command of troops in time of war. It is not because he is not courageous, it is not because he is not patriotic, but there are many reasons connected with it which prevent him from acquiring that efficiency which he ought to have.

Now, if he does acquire it, you may be sure there will be demand enough in case of a great war for all of those men as officers. If he does not acquire it, the fact that some governor has given him an office in a militia organization or some men have elected him as an officer of a company or a regiment ought not to make us do, not only a bad thing, but what amounts almost to a treasonable thing. To send men under modern conditions of warfare not properly officered is to send them to plain and sure death. And it is not fair to the patriotism of America to have the men who volunteer to fight our battles go out officered by incompetent men.

Mr. EMERSON. Do you mean to say that an officer of the Regular Army has more love for the life of his men than an officer of the National Guard?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not give a hang for love that is not backed by enough intelligence to make the love of some value when it comes to a battle field. [Applause.]

Mr. FOCHT. Now, in a practical way, where did the regular officer get any more knowledge than a National Guardsman, since there has been no war since 1899, and the National Guardsmen were all there?

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman thinks that question needs answering, all right. I do not think anybody else in the House does. It is perfectly manifest that a man who gives his whole time and is trained in the science of warfare is superior to the man who gives sporadically of his time to the training of militia troops.

Mr. FOCHT. Is it not a known fact that the failures in the War with Spain in 1899 were due to the fact that were was not provision made to receive and properly handle the troops that offered themselves? And who was responsible for the failure of the War Department?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is not a known fact. There was trouble, just as I believe there will be trouble again, because we fail to provide in time of peace for the proper overhead organization, so that they can take care of the tremendous business that is thrown on them in time of war; but one of the troubles was that their duties were made more excessive because of the lack of experience of both the men and officers who volunteered. I submit that this is just plain common sense. It is whether we shall vote for our country and all our people or whether we shall vote because of our pride in our local organizations.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, how much time is wanted?

Mr. FESS. I would like two minutes.

Mr. HAY. Mr Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto conclude in seven minutes

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto shall close in seven minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be an inevitable conflict here between those who believe in the National Guard and those who believe in the regular standing army. That is inevitable. We can not hope to avoid it. I am not stating whether this amendment should be passed or not. I am not sure in my own mind.

But I rise simply to refer to the crimination that was made a while ago in reference to major generals weighing 300 pounds becoming so active on behalf of the National Guard. I should like to say that one, at least, of those to whom the reference was made has been in the service 32 years, has enlisted more men in the service than any man in the Regular Army, and organized a rifle club that went to Europe and competed with the world and brought back the rank of the champion rifleman of the world. [Applause.]

I want that much to go into the RECORD with reference to the statement of my good friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], which I do not think was entirely dignified.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GARDNER. There were three of those major generals.

Mr. FESS. I specifically refer to Gen. A. B. Critchfield, of Ohio.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I have only one or two words to say in reference to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON]. If the amendment is adopted it destroys the bill. We might as well abandon it. It would destroy all the other legislation in the bill.

Moreover, it is unconstitutional. You can not pass a law which will compel the President of the United States to appoint a certain man as a brigadier general. The Constitution confers upon the President the authority to appoint these officers, and Congress can not pass a law compelling him to appoint certain officers which Congress may choose to pick out.

Now, I do not see any reason why gentlemen should be so much affected by the word "draft." It does not carry—in this bill, at least—anything with it which reflects upon any man who happens to join this organization. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, may I offer an amendment now?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONDON: Add a new section, after section 25, to be designated as "section 25a," and which is to read as follows:

"That no member of the National Guard shall be called upon to perform duty in connection with any controversy which may arise between capital and labor."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that under the Constitution, which provides that the States may have these troops, Congress can prevent, in time of peace, the use of troops to quell any disturbance, riot, or anything of that sort; and if it is an unconstitutional provision, it must be subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks this amendment is subject to the same objection that the Chair suggested to the gentleman awhile ago. There is no legal definition of "strikes" and no legal definition of "contests between capital and labor."

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair hear me for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KEATING as a new section, to be known as section 25a:

"SEC. 25a. That no member of the National Guard shall be called upon to perform duty in connection with controversies between employers and employees where the question at issue is one of hours of labor, wages, working conditions, or the right of either side of the controversy to organize for the safeguarding of its legal interests."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear from the gentleman from Virginia on that.

Mr. HAY. Well, Mr. Chairman, in the first place, this amendment prevents the individual from joining the National Guard, as I heard it read. But I wish the Clerk would read it again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. HAY. I make a point of order against the amendment, on the same ground as that upon which I made the former point of order, that this interferes with the right of the States to preserve order in the States.

I do not see that Congress has any more right to prohibit a member of the National Guard from suppressing disorder than it has to prevent an organization of the National Guard from doing it. One is the same as the other. If you prohibit the members from enforcing the law as is provided in the Constitution, you prohibit the organization from doing it and you prohibit the State from doing it, because that is the only arm that the State has to enforce it.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear from the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KEATING. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois. I do not know what attitude he will take on it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, unless I am entirely mistaken in the scope of this bill, it relates only to the organization of the National Guard and that part of our military organization which affects the National Guard. It does not in any way relate to the duties that the National Guard shall perform in the various States.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] undertakes to define the duties of the National Guard and of the members of the National Guard in the States, or, rather, it undertakes to define what they shall not be. Now, to undertake to describe the duties of an organization is not germane at all, it seems to me, to the proposition to create the organization. This bill does not attempt to do more than to provide the organization. It does not attempt to define what shall be the duty of the National Guard in any respect whatever, except in so far as it may be called as an organization into the Army in case of war; and if this amendment be germane, then it would be germane to prescribe any duty which Congress might seek to impose upon the National Guard in the States.

The CHAIRMAN. Would the gentleman permit the Chair?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment provides that "no member of the National Guard shall be called upon to perform duty in connection with controversies between employers and employees." That, of course, if it should be held in order and should be adopted, would be construed with all the rest of the law applying to the National Guard.

It seems to the Chair that it would mean that the President of the United States, or the Federal authority, could not call out the National Guard for these purposes, and would not interfere with the State authorities calling out the National Guard for such purposes. If the Chair is in error about that, he will be glad to be corrected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if I correctly get the scope of the bill, it seems to me that the National Guard are only called out under the bill into the Federal service as members of the National Guard and not as organizations of the National Guard; and when they are called into the Federal service under the terms of this bill, I believe they cease to be members of the National Guard. But this is endeavoring to prescribe the duties. There is nothing in the bill which undertakes to prescribe the duties. Of course, the bill might have contained a section undertaking to prescribe the duties, but there is nothing in the bill on the subject, if I am correct in my impression, and hence there is nothing germane upon which to hang this amendment.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. Does not the bill provide that a member of the National Guard shall perform certain duties? He becomes a part of the armed force of the United States. He suppresses insurrection; he meets foreign and domestic enemies of the country; he does all the things that the President may order him to do.

Mr. MANN. Where is that provision in the bill?

Mr. KEATING. Is not that the whole purpose of the bill?

Mr. MANN. The whole purpose of the bill is to provide an organization, not to prescribe its duties.

Mr. KEATING. But the bill provides that a man shall take an oath that he will perform certain duties.

Mr. MANN. That is a part of the organization.

Mr. KEATING. Certainly. In the same sense that the proposed amendment is a part of the organization.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; this is telling what they shall do as an organization, and the whole purpose of the bill is to provide an organization. Now, I do not think it is germane, in providing an organization, to prescribe what the duties of the organization shall be. Of course, the committee might have brought in a bill to that effect, but it did not do it.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman pardon me?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. KEATING. The title of the bill is "to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States."

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, the title does not cut any figure in this.

Mr. KEATING. With all due deference to all the other amendments which have been offered here, I submit that no amendment offered on this floor is better calculated to increase the efficiency of the National Guard of this country than the amendment submitted by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON], and for which I have provided a substitute.

Mr. MANN. That is a moral opinion, not a legal opinion. I am endeavoring to discuss the legal question before the House.

Mr. KEATING. I agree that the gentleman is much more competent to do that than I am.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KEATING. Certainly.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman undertake to say that the President of the United States could do more with the National Guard than he could with the Federal Army?

Mr. KEATING. No.

Mr. HELM. Does not the Constitution of the United States specifically limit the power of the President of the United States to use the Federal Army within the borders of a State, except under specific limitations, to suppress rebellion or insurrection, or where there is a condition of lawlessness such that the State can not control it? So if you admit that the President could not do more with the National Guard than he could do with the Regular Army, it seems to me that you confess yourself out of court.

Mr. KEATING. I am not attempting to grant to the President of the United States any power which is not granted to him under the Constitution.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. If such a condition of disorder or riot should prevail as to necessitate calling out the troops to protect the good order of society, would it then be material what the original issue was which resulted in that condition?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I will very gladly discuss that phase of the question with the gentleman if we ever get the question before the House. The question that is now before the House is whether this amendment is germane. Here we are considering a bill to federalize the militia of the United States. We have put into this bill all manner of restrictions, so as to make the militia subject to the United States, to the orders of the President and of Congress, and now we quibble over a little amendment which says that the militia shall not be used for the purpose of interfering in industrial disputes; and that is objected to on the ground that we are defining the duties of the militia. Why, every line of this bill defines the duties of the National Guard and the duties of officers of the Regular Army. It is a mere quibble, my friends. This amendment is clearly a limitation and is clearly in order.

Mr. SANFORD. I call the gentleman's attention to the provision of the bill to fix the pay of the National Guard. Does the gentleman think it possible that it is not germane to fix their duties, but is germane to fix their pay?

Mr. KEATING. I confess that I can not follow the kind of reasoning which would offer a negative answer to the gentleman's question.

Mr. SANFORD. I can not, either.

Mr. KEATING. I quite agree with the gentleman.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I can not agree with the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] that this amendment is a small proposition. What does it propose to do? It proposes to take from the States the rights which are reserved to the States under the Constitution of the United States to use the militia in suppressing internal strife too strong to be controlled by the civil authorities of the State. Therefore an attempt by this House to adopt this amendment would be an attempt to go into the face of the Constitution and place upon the statute books a law that would be clearly unconstitutional. There is no question but what a State has the right under the Federal Constitution to use the militia to protect itself in its sovereign rights, but this amendment proposes to take from the State that right. Therefore the amendment should be considered out of order, because the proposed legislation would not be constitutional.

The CHAIRMAN. The argument which the gentleman from Kentucky has made goes to the merits of the proposition.

Mr. FIELDS. I think so.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the immediate question before the Chair is the technical proposition whether it is in order under the rules of the House and the special rule under which we are operating.

Mr. FIELDS. I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that any amendment which clearly is unconstitutional is not in order on this or any other bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman permit the Chair to call his attention to the decisions laid down in volume 2, section 1323, of Hinds' Precedents:

It is for the House and not the Speaker to decide on the legislative effect of a question.

That is one thing. Section 1328, Hinds' Precedents, says:

The fact that a proposed amendment is inconsistent with the text, or embodies a proposition already voted on, constitutes a condition to be passed upon by the House and not by the Speaker.

In section 1255 it is said:

It is not the duty of the Speaker to construe the Constitution as affecting proposed legislation.

Mr. FIELDS. I admit, Mr. Chairman, that where there is room for doubt as to the constitutionality of a question, that it is within the province of the House and not the Chair to settle the question. In this proposition there is no question, it seems to me, as to the right of a State to control the militia in putting down internal strife too strong to be controlled by civil authority. In view of that fact, there should be no question as to the constitutionality of the proposition.

Mr. HAY. Do I understand that the Chair thinks that this should be submitted to the House whether it is constitutional, and without debate?

The CHAIRMAN. It is a question for the House whether it is constitutional. The Chair will state his impressions.

Mr. HAY. I would like the Chair to hear the gentleman from Alabama first.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state his impressions without ruling, and then hear the gentleman. The amendment reads:

No member of the National Guard shall be called upon to perform duty in case of a controversy between the employer and the employee where the question involves—

And so forth.

The Chair thinks that if that provision should go into the law it would be construed in connection with other provisions, and it would mean that the Federal authority could not call upon the National Guard, or any member of the National Guard, to perform duty under the circumstances laid down.

The Chair does not think that it would interfere with the State authorities calling on the National Guard. If the Chair did think that it would interfere with the State authorities calling on the National Guard, the Chair would hold it out of order as not being germane.

Mr. HAY. I do not think there is any question that it would, because it is a very broad proposition. "Any member of the National Guard." Now a member of the National Guard is a soldier, and in time of peace the only reason for calling him out for training purposes under the provisions of this bill is under the authority of the State. If this amendment is adopted no governor of a State could call out the National Guard to suppress a riot, or anything else. It would be right in the teeth of the law if this should be put in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado put that same construction on it?

Mr. KEATING. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if Congress were to attempt to place a restriction on the authority of the governor which Congress is not authorized to place upon the governor by the Constitution of the United States, the matter would be disposed of in a moment when it came up in court. In other words, we can not by passing a law here exercise a power that the Constitution does not confer upon us. Therefore if Congress can not restrict the power of a governor this provision would not apply.

Mr. HAY. In other words, the gentleman from Colorado agrees with me as to the construction of the law.

Mr. KEATING. I think the courts would decide the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will sustain the point of order. Does the gentleman from Colorado appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I will appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken, and the committee voted that the decision of the Chair should stand as the judgment of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 26. That no State shall maintain troops in time of peace other than as authorized in accordance with the organization prescribed under this act: Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed as limiting the rights of the States and Territories to the use of the National Guard within their respective borders in time of peace.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I have been engaged in committee work while this bill has been under consideration, but I wish to briefly state my position. I voted for the Kahn amendment to increase the Regular Army, and I will vote for any amendment which increases the power and efficiency of this bill; but if, as seems probable, all such amendments fail and it is the purpose of the majority to push the bill through just as it is, still I shall vote for it, not because I think it at all adequate, but because it is a slight improvement over present conditions and is the best the majority will allow us.

A man's opinion as to the Army we ought to have will be determined by two considerations—first, the probability of our being attacked, and, second, our strength relative to the probable assailant. Of course, if one thinks we are in no danger of attack, he will oppose any increase of force. That has been our public sentiment in the past, which has prevented our spending more on national defense. We thought that the military powers of the world were so afraid of each other that none of them could risk an attack on us, and we also thought the reign of reason and justice was gradually displacing brute force. Therefore we were immune.

But the present European war has entirely changed conditions. If either side shall win, the balance of power in Europe will be destroyed. That wipes away our first defense. And this war, with its incredible atrocities and frightfulness, has demonstrated that we were all wrong in our theory that the time had come when reason and justice could rule the world, though unsupported by armies. So our second defense is gone. Just now brute force dominates the thought of all Europe. Its influence can not end suddenly with the war. And whichever side emerges victorious will be violently tempted to attack any nation which is rich enough to make the victor covetous and not armed enough to make him afraid. No nation fills that rôle as well as we. We are rich and fat and bulky, but against any of the veteran armies of Europe we are defenseless. Our mobile army is less than 50,000—a mere mouthful to any probable opponent—and this bill only increases it 10,000 a year.

Orators try to drug us into the belief that we are formidable because we are a martial people, and that before any assailant could reach us we could raise an irresistible army. But that army could be strong only in numbers. The whole history of war has proved the impotence of numbers against discipline. Never was that weakness and discrepancy so great as to-day. Never before did it require so much time to adequately prepare for war. Individual valor counts less to-day than ever before, and for two conspicuous reasons. One is that irresistible engines of destruction are employed now which require experience to handle and experience to defend against. Another is that armies are so vast now that without long drill and discipline they can not be maneuvered and made effective. War is to-day scientific, and each soldier must learn to be not only a brave unit but a cog in a vast machine which will only work effectively when every part is trained and experienced.

We can not accomplish any material increase of our Navy in less than two years. That may be too late. But if we were in earnest we could in one year have a trained army large enough to make any nation hesitate about attacking us. The petty increases authorized by this bill amount to nothing compared with the gigantic forces which could be arrayed against us. It is to me incomprehensible that an administration which talks so seriously about the danger which confronts us will take no adequate step to insure against that danger now. If there is real danger, as the President tells us, and as I believe there is likely to be at the end of this war, we are utterly unprepared to cope with it and are living in a fool's paradise. The fate of Belgium might easily be ours. Now ought to be our time of serious self-sacrifice. This bill is simply a sop to public opinion and is utterly inadequate, but, of course, everyone must vote for it, because it slightly improves present conditions.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of putting a table into the RECORD showing the quota of the various States in the Spanish War and the troops furnished by those States. I will say that the State of Ohio furnished more than her quota—2,700 more than her quota, which was very much more than any other State in the Union did in that respect.

Mr. MADDEN. That was because the President came from Ohio.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman what is the purpose of putting this in? Everyone knows it was a matter of favoritism if any State got any more than its quota. We offered 27 regiments in Illinois.

Mr. GARDNER. There were 16 States that did not furnish their full quota.

Mr. MADDEN. Everyone knew that McKinley was President and that was the reason why Ohio got more than her quota.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section. This section has given me a great deal of trouble. Nervousness exists in my State in regard to it, and there may be other States in the same situation. When I appealed to the committee to help me out they simply reminded me that it reenacted the Constitution and therefore could do no harm. If it does simply reenact the Constitution, it accomplishes nothing. If it does any more than that it seems to me that it may do harm. There are organizations in my State composed of some of our finest and most patriotic men, maintained in part by the State, which are not a part of the National Guard and which would not come in under this bill at all. These organizations serve a most worthy purpose, and the people of my State are desirous that they shall continue. The Constitution says that no State shall, without the consent of Congress, keep troops in time of peace. The organizations of which I speak are armed and equipped. They do State service, but are not a part of the National Guard, and should have no concern, except as patriotic citizens, in regard to the provisions of this bill. They do, however, wish to maintain their existence, and the people of the State wish them to maintain it. If they have had the consent of Congress heretofore—and I can not say whether they have had or not—it seems to me that this section might take that privilege away from those organizations, and it ought not to be done.

This section states in almost the language of the Constitution that no State shall maintain troops in time of peace other than in accordance with the organization prescribed under this act. Does it refer to the organizations I have mentioned? All I wish is that these fine bodies of men, organized and equipped as a State force, for the purposes of that State, but not a part of the National Guard, be left alone as they are, without being disturbed by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman what, in his judgment, would be the effect of this section upon a body of troops that we maintain in the State of Texas, commonly called the Texas Rangers? It is a mounted constabulary, not confined by county lines, and we have used them to repel invasions from Mexico at times, and we have sent them all over the State. It is a body of State troops directly under the adjutant general of the State.

Mr. TILSON. The answer of our friend the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to that question would probably be that those are not troops, but I do not wish to have any question of doubt left in regard to it. I should not like to have any rights heretofore conferred by Congress upon the splendid organization in my State taken away by this section, especially when all it seems to do is to reenact the Constitution by saying that no State shall keep troops in time of peace except as provided in this bill.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I am very much surprised at the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON]. The striking out of this section will weaken this bill. We are trying to federalize the militia, and the gentleman is trying to have a lot of organizations in the State which will not come under the provisions of this bill. If we are going to do this, let us do it, and do not let us put in provisions to strike out sections of the bill which will enable all kinds of organizations to be maintained in the different States. What we want to do is to make it uniform. There is a provision in the bill that these ancient organizations which were raised before 1792 shall not be interfered with except in time of war. I think that is a bad proposition, and if anyone offers an amendment to change it I am going to vote for it; but we have taken care to that extent of the organizations about which the gentleman is talking.

Mr. TILSON. But those are organizations that wish to come in under this bill.

Mr. HAY. That is true.

Mr. TILSON. But these organizations of which I speak do not wish to come in.

Mr. HAY. All I want to say is that under the law now, if they want to have some State troops that do not want to come in under the provisions of this bill, which are for parade purposes and social purposes, they can go ahead and do it; nobody is objecting to it. But if they are going to have militia of any sort, it must be an establishment organized under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Chairman, if he thinks the language in section 26 would have any bearing whatever upon the organization of mounted troops such as we have in the State of Texas?

Mr. HAY. I do not know to what the gentleman refers.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will tell the gentleman. They are commonly referred to as the Texas Rangers, which is a mounted constabulary, and my recollection is the language in the statute calls them mounted State troops. That is my recollection. Anyway, they are mounted constabulary and are not confined in their operations to any county or specific district, but to the whole State of Texas, and they are not for parade or social purposes, either.

Mr. HAY. They are in effect constabulary?

Mr. SLAYDEN. But that word is not employed.

Mr. HAY. They are in effect what we call a constabulary force or a police force?

Mr. SLAYDEN. They are used to suppress riots, and so forth.

Mr. HAY. And therefore do not come under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And they have actually been down on the border to help repel invasion.

Mr. HAY. But we do not call them State Militia?

Mr. SLAYDEN. No.

Mr. HAY. Then they do not come under this bill.

Mr. CALDWELL. I will state to the gentleman that we had under consideration both the Texas State Rangers and the Pennsylvania Constabulary——

Mr. SLAYDEN. Which is a parallel organization?

Mr. CALDWELL. Which is a parallel organization; and we considered both, and it was definitely determined by members of the committee that this did not cover those organizations.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But does the individual determination of individual members of the committee control the interpretation of this——

Mr. CALDWELL. The bill controls it, because the provision only applies to the National Guard—that is, soldiers of the National Guard.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It says "other organizations."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 27. That the enlisted strength of all organizations of the National Guard both in peace and war, shall be as the President of the United States shall prescribe. And whenever any State shall, within a limit of time to be fixed by the President, have failed or refused to comply with or enforce any requirement of this act, or any regulation promulgated thereunder and in aid thereof by the President or the Secretary of War, the National Guard of such State shall be debarred, wholly or in part, as the President may direct, from receiving from the United States any pecuniary or other aid, benefit, or privilege authorized or provided by this act or any other law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words. The last four words are "or any other law." Will the chairman of the committee kindly indicate the purpose of those words, "or any other law"?

Mr. HAY. Yes. "Any other law" means any other law which confers pecuniary or other aid, benefit, or privilege upon the States in connection with the National Guard.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That brings up the question I wanted to ask. The power to enforce this law is conferred generally upon the President whenever war is imminent, and so forth. Is there anything in the bill anywhere which indicates to what extent the President shall draw upon the various States for troops that may be needed in the imminence of war?

Mr. HAY. Yes; section 77 of the bill provides a draft in time of war. Of course, the President can draft 10,000 men or 50,000 men, or any number he pleases.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is there anything showing how he shall apportion them among the States?

Mr. HAY. No.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So he could make that draft upon one State?

Mr. HAY. He could make it against one State if that State had as many members of the National Guard as he called for, but, of course, if he did call them out, he would necessarily apportion them among all the States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If he cared to exercise the discretion conferred in the bill and needed 50,000 men, he could draw upon New York for the 50,000 men?

Mr. HAY. He could, if there were 50,000 in the National Guard of New York; but that he probably would not do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Or if he cared to draw upon the State of Delaware for as many men as he cared to draw upon from the State of Pennsylvania, he might do so?

Mr. HAY. He could not do that, because the State of Delaware would not have as many men in the National Guard as they would have in the National Guard of Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But there is no limitation upon his discretion in the matter?

Mr. HAY. There is no limitation except his own good sense.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Of course it is presumed he would exercise his good sense, but he would have the power to localize a draft for any number he might see fit. As to these four words, I have moved to strike out merely for the purpose of obtaining information. They operate in the nature of a punishment upon the National Guard of that State which fails to respond to the President's demand?

Mr. HAY. No; they operate in this way: If they do not conform to the provisions of this act, they do not get any of the benefits of it. They do not get any pay; they do not get any appropriation for their State troops unless they conform to the provisions of this act.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, unless the State comes up to the President's requisition as to the enlisted strength of the organization within the State, then the National Guard of that State—not the State itself, but the National Guard—in order to derive any pecuniary or other aid, benefit, or privilege, authorized by the provisions of this act "or any other law," is to be punished in the manner indicated?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Do not these four words, "or any other law," raise a constitutional question as to the right of the State in the event of the President's undertaking——

Mr. HAY. "Or any other law" means any other law of Congress. It does not mean the law of a State. We have not the power to repeal any law or amend the law of any State.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the term is general. Suppose it was made to apply to a law affecting agricultural benefits?

Mr. HAY. It means by "or any other law," plainly referring to this particular subject. It can not mean an agricultural law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The act prescribes about all that you desire to prescribe in the matter of law pertaining to the militia. Why borrow trouble, dating back to the origin of the Government, as to "other laws" that may affect the militia?

Mr. HAY. It means "or any other law" which confers pecuniary or other benefit or privilege on the National Guard.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will pardon me, as it reads it is clear that if a State does not come up to the present requisition its National Guard shall be deprived of whatever it may be receiving under this act. That is clear. "Or any other law" might pertain to anything, relating to the National Guard or any other proposition. I submit to the gentleman it does raise a question.

Mr. HAY. I am sorry I can not agree with my friend. I do not think any court on earth would construe it in any other than the way I have indicated.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman feels that these words as used pertain to militia laws only?

Mr. HAY. Surely. There can not be a question about it.

Mr. HILL. I want to vote for the bill, and intend to do so, and I would like to vote for a good deal more than this. I want to vote understandingly, and I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HAY. Very well.

Mr. HILL. Would not the passage of this bill destroy the present State militia?

Mr. HAY. I do not know what you mean.

Mr. HILL. I mean, force out from the present State militia every person who is not willing to take this double obligation and submit himself to the requirements of a draft by the President of the United States in case of war?

Mr. HAY. That is true.

Mr. HILL. That is the intention of the bill? It seems to me——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. My understanding of it since the gentleman's explanation is that the general militia force of the United States is between the ages of 18 and 45, but they can not be organized under the provision except as they are organized with this double obligation to the National Government. Am I correct?

Mr. HAY. You are correct in so far as that when any of the unorganized militia provided for in section 22 undertake to become Organized Militia they must be organized under the provisions of this act.

Mr. HILL. So that there can not be any organization of any militia force whatever by the State unless it is made under the provisions of this act?

Mr. HAY. That is right.

Mr. HILL. And they simply have the material between 18 and 25 years?

Mr. HAY. That is right.

Mr. HILL. I am for it with that understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 28. That the number of enlisted men of the National Guard to be organized under this act within one year from its passage shall be for each State in the proportion of 200 such men for each Senator and Representative in Congress from such State, and a number to be determined by the President for each Territory and the District of Columbia, and shall be increased each year thereafter in the proportion of not less than 50 per cent until a total peace strength of not less than 800 enlisted men for each Senator and Representative in Congress has been reached: Provided, That this shall not be construed to prevent any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia from organizing the full number of troops required under this section in less time than is specified in this section.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. What is going to become of the National Guard as organized now?

Mr. HAY. It is necessary for them to take the oath, both officers and enlisted men.

Mr. REILLY. In my district they have more than 200 National Guard.

Mr. HAY. The bill provides that you may have as many as you please, but that is the smallest number.

Mr. REILLY. As I read the bill, you would have 200 when this bill would go into effect, and it would increase a certain percentage every year after?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. REILLY. In my district there is something like 500 National Guard at the present time.

Mr. HAY. If the gentleman will look at line 21 it says:

That this shall not be construed to prevent any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia from organizing the full number of troops required under this section in less time than is specified in this section.

Mr. REILLY. Then, according to your view, the whole number of the guard, as organized at the present time, could go right in?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. REILLY. That is the way it ought to do.

Mr. HAY. That is the way it is.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 29. That any corps of Artillery, Cavalry, or Infantry existing in any of the States on the passage of the act of May 8, 1792, which by the laws, customs, or usages of said States has been in continuous existence since the passage of said act, under its provisions and under the provisions of section 232, and sections 1625 to 1660, both inclusive, of title 16 of the Revised Statutes of 1873, and the act of January 21, 1903, relating to the militia, shall be allowed to retain their ancient privileges, subject, nevertheless, to all duties required by law of militia: Provided, That said organizations may be a part of the National Guard and entitled to all the privileges of this act, and shall conform in all respects to the organization, discipline, and training of the National Guard in time of war.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WISE] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 51, section 29, line 17, by striking out at the end of line 17 the words "in time of war," and insert in lieu thereof the words "when in the service of the United States."

Mr. WISE. Mr. Chairman, if I can clearly state the proposition covered by this amendment, I think everybody can see the force of it. We are adopting a general policy for the Army. This section undertakes to make certain exceptions for certain organizations who want to receive all the benefits and privileges that are conferred by this act and still not really be a part of the National Guard and not be compelled to conform to all the requirements that are required of every other organization in the United States. I believe that if you are going to have an army that when men are called out into the service every single man should stand on an equal footing and that no particular organization, located anywhere, ought to receive the benefit of this act and still have all their rights and privileges that they claim have come down to them for years and years.

This amendment allows them all their rights. We allow them special privileges, even if you adopt this amendment; for in time of peace, when not in the service of the United States, they can have their officers to rule over them just as they have now. And yet they want to go further and ask Congress to adopt a military policy which allows them, when called into the service of the United States, "to still maintain their separate organizations and fight where they please and under whom they please." Is that a correct military policy? Is it right?

We are supposed to be adopting a general military policy. If we should pass this provision it makes exception to certain organizations. That is the criticism of your National Guard; that you have different organizations and 48 differeint armies; and yet in this bill you are undertaking to put in still more exceptions, and allow all organizations to come in and claim all the benefits under the bill and still not become really a part of the National Guard or an integral part of the Army. For these reasons I hope the amendment will be adopted. Having said this as to the amendment, I desire to discuss the general features of the bill.

And in discussing this bill I can only mention the main features of same in the limited time allotted to me. We are undertaking to provide a plan of defense for our country, sometimes called "preparedness" and sometimes "adequate defense." We are all agreed on the necessity of being prepared, but the great difference consists in what constitutes preparedness. This bill is the result of the different views of the members of the committee, and, I might say, not the bill that any single member of the committee would have drawn if left to himself. Some thought it did not go far enough; others of us thought it went too far and provided more men than necessary for the standing Army in times of peace and to that extent a useless waste of money.

To sanely and conservatively estimate what should be our legislation, so far as the Army part of the preparedness program is concerned, we should know what it is or who it is we are to prepare against. It is evident that we are already well prepared against any nation except such as are separated from us by from 3,000 to 6,000 miles of water, and practically all the larger nations that could possibly give us any trouble are now engaged in war and naturally will not be in position, either one of them, to enter a new war for some time to come. Our Navy at present is third, and by many claimed to be the second, strongest in the world. So it is inconceivable almost that any nation will immediately undertake to land an army on our shores. We have treaties with most of these nations that, in the event of differences between us, we would take at least one year to consider the matter before war should be declared. It is very likely, at least it is worthy of being in position to try, that when the nations now engaged in war gather to agree on terms of peace at the close of the present war their condition will be such that they will readily consent to enter into an agreement to limit armament and preparations for war, and thereby save to all nations the enormous expenses and burdens of preparing for future wars.

No one expects war with England. We do not expect France to ever give us any serious trouble. Is it likely that Germany, after this war, will at any time in the near future, or ever, seek trouble with us? Has she not always been friendly to us, respecting our rights as much, if not more, than the other nations?

So, then, who is it, and what country is it, that is so likely to invade our shores and require us to defend ourselves? If any of them should ever attack us and destroy our Navy and we should lose all control of the sea, men to invade our country would have to be landed; and all evidence before us is that not more than 250,000 men could be brought at one time, and I am not convinced that this is possible. But supposing such possible, though very improbable, thing should happen, let us examine this bill and see if it is not sufficient and adequate to defend and protect us against all or any one who might seek to conquer us.

What does the bill propose in its essential and principal features?

First. A Regular Army of 140,000 men in times of peace, and if war was imminent to increase it, in round numbers, to 200,000 men. Is this a sufficient size standing army to perform all the functions and duties of the Army in times of peace? This was the plan of the committee—to authorize a standing army only large enough for peace purposes and not on a war basis. We believe this is the correct policy this Government should follow. In support of this, in the evidence before the committee by the Chief of Staff and Secretary of War, both agreed that an Army of 135,000 to 140,000 men was large enough for all peace purposes.

Then we provide an additional force for Federal service when the Government needs them, composed of the National Guard, to consist of not less than 200 men to each Representative and Senator, and to be recruited up to 800 men for each in a period of a few years, which will give use a force of at least 400,000 men in the National Guard.

In addition, we provide for additional officers and military training in schools and training camps. So, taking in all these, the Regular Army, the National Guard, and those who have already and will in the near future have had military training in the United States, we could in a very short time organize and have in the field from at least 800,000 to 1,000,000 men.

The foregoing being true, the question naturally arises, Is that a sufficient force of men to defend us? No nation on this continent would think of attacking us, and no one knowing the facts and having regard for the truth will seriously contend that any nation could land men here fast enough to give us serious trouble on land, and I do not believe, knowing we have this force, will ever try it.

But they say the National Guard is not a dependable force. Why not? This is the plan of the Constitution, and this bill is framed on that instrument, and we believe now, as the men who made it over 100 years ago, that it is the correct policy for this Government to pursue at this time, which was, and is now, a standing army large enough only for peace purposes and a trained militia or citizen soldiers, which is now called in this bill the National Guard. This charge is made only by those who want a large standing army.

From all this agitation of preparedness and criticism of this bill, it seems to me that it is well to go back to first principles and get the real situation as it is and the plan of the Constitution as adopted. Of course you are familiar with that section which relates to the militia, but I quote it again:

> The Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrections, and repel invasions; to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

From this you will note that the Federal Government has the absolute right to use the National Guard in the following respects and to order it into the service of the United States for these purposes: First, to execute the laws of the United States; second, to suppress insurrections; third, to repel invasion. Any officer or enlisted man who fails to respond is now subject to the same punishment as a deserter from the Regular Army.

Under this section of the Constitution the Federal Government also has the right to prescribe the form of its organization and make it conform to that of the Regular Army; also to prescribe its armament and equipment and make them conform to that of the Regular Army; and also to prescribe the discipline of the National Guard. All arms of the National Guard are now drilling under the regulations used by the Regular Army.

In view of all this power given the Federal Government by the Constitution, what is the objection to this section and to the use of this military force? The extreme militarists claim that the founders of this Government overlooked something in this section and that they made a mistake. From the position of those who criticize and would ignore this section and abandon the National Guard on account of it, they say there are two fatal defects—

First. That the National Guard can not be used to invade a foreign country unless it revolunteers. So far as I am concerned, I think this is a wise limitation, for we do not want to invade foreign countries, and we do not want a force for offense, except to such an extent as may be necessary to defend ourselves; and under this section of the Constitution the Federal Government has the power to use them to repel invasion, and if necessary to repel invasion would be authorized in carrying them out of the boundaries of the United States if the invasion was imminent in the opinion of the Commander in Chief of the Army.

But they say there is another objection, that the States have the right to appoint the officers. The Federal Government certainly has, under this clause of the Constitution, the power, and in this bill we undertake to prescribe the qualifications of the officers that shall be put in charge of the National Guard; but the States have the right and power, and ought to have, to appoint these officers from such men as are qualified under the rules prescribed by this act. The States have already, almost without exception, provided examining boards before which the officers must pass satisfactory examinations on subjects touching their qualifications for the positions to which they are to be appointed. The governors of the States in the past have discovered good officers, and I believe that the officers now in the National Guard will compare favorably with the officers of the Regular Army.

But it will be interesting to return to the consideration of this section, and further answering those who criticize it for various reasons, to recall the fierce debates over this section by those who participated in the drafting and adoption of the same. I therefore ask your attention while I quote a few of the words of those who were opposed to the same, and those who were in favor of its adoption. Those who opposed it doing so on the ground that it took all the power away from the States and left them without any authority whatever; and those who favored it contending that they believed that the Federal Government should have this power; and the Constitutional Convention agreed to the latter contention, that the power and control over this force, as prescribed in the Constitution, should be in the Federal Government, and ever since that time the Federal Government has had absolute power and control at any time to call out the Organized Militia, which is now known as the National Guard, and to use them for all the purposes for which I believe it is necessary, to wit, to execute the laws, suppress insurrections, and repel invasion.

To quote from Patrick Henry in an argument on this section of the Constitution, he says:

> Your militia is given up to Congress—all power will be in their own possession. Of what service would militia be to you, when, most probably, you will not have a single musket in the State? For, as arms are to be provided by Congress, they may or may not furnish them.

Continuing further, he said:

> Let me here call your attention to that part which gives the Congress the power to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States; reserving to the State, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress. By this, sir, you see that their control over our last and best defense is unlimited. If they refuse or neglect to discipline or arm our militia, they will be useless; the States can do neither, this power being exclusively given to Congress. The power of appointing officers over men not disciplined or armed is ridiculous; so that this pretended little remains of power left the States may, at the pleasure of Congress, be rendered nugatory.

It will be seen that he opposed the adoption of this section on the ground that it took all the power over the militia from the States and vested it in the Federal Government.

And then listen to the argument replying to this attack by James Madison in this same Virginia convention:

> But the honorable member sees great danger in the provision concerning the militia. Now, sir, this I conceive to be an additional security to our liberties without diminishing the power of the States to any considerable degree. It appears to me so highly expedient that I should imagine that it would have found advocates even in the warmest friends of the present system. The authority of training the militia and appointing the officers is reserved to the States. But Congress ought to have the power of establishing a uniform system of discipline throughout the States, and to provide for the execution of the laws, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions. These are the only cases wherein they can interfere with the militia; and the obvious necessity of their having power over them in these cases must flash conviction to any reflecting mind. Without uniformity of discipline military bodies would be incapable of action; without a general controlling power to call forth the strength of the Union for the purpose of repelling invasion the country might be overrun and conquered by foreign enemies. Without such a power to suppress insurrections our liberties might be destroyed by intestine factions and domestic tyranny be established.

And, also, I quote you from the words of Alexander Hamilton with reference to this section, as published in the Federalist:

> It requires no skill in the science of war to discern that uniformity in the organization and discipline of the militia would be attended with the most beneficial effects whenever they were called into service for the public defense. It would enable them to discharge the duties of the camp and the field with mutual intelligence and concert, an advantage of peculiar moment in the operations of an army; and it would fit them much sooner to acquire the degree of proficiency in military functions which would be essential to their usefulness. This desirable uniformity can only be accomplished by confiding the regular of the militia to the national authority. It is therefore with the most evident propriety that the plan of the convention proposes to empower the Union "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress."
> If standing armies are dangerous to liberty, an efficacious power over the militia, in the body to whose care the State is committed, ought as far as possible to take away the inducement and the pretext to such unfriendly institutions. If the Federal Government can command the aid of the militia in those emergencies which call for the military arm in support of the civil magistrate, it can better dispense with the employment of a different kind of force. If it can not avail itself of the former, it will be obliged to recur to the latter. To render an army unnecessary will be a more certain method of preventing its existence than a thousand prohibitions on paper.

I could quote you from numerous others who participated in this debate—those who stood for State rights and those who believed that the control should be in the General Government—showing that the men on both sides of this question in the constitutional convention, when the same was adopted, agreed on the effect of this section of the Constitution; that it would take the power over the militia and its control away from the States and vest it in the Federal Government.

I believe the correct military policy is contained in this, which is a standing army sufficient for all purposes in times of peace, and a trained citizen soldiery, such as the National Guard, if we should ever need them in emergencies or in time of war. It is well known that no war was ever won with only a standing army and never will be, for all nations who have relied entirely on a large standing army, without any reference to the militia or trained citizen soldiers, have failed, and that the citizen soldier has always been the one who won the wars. This policy would also prevent the United States from being turned into an armed camp and from going into a state of complete militarism, to which I am opposed.

Another thing will be noted, that if we should undertake to raise a large standing army and ignore entirely the militia, that under our present volunteer system we would never be able to recruit, according to the evidence before us, which is undisputed by military men and officers of high standing in the Army who have had this work in charge, up to the amount that is stated to be necessary to defend us in an emergency; and necessarily, as these men very frankly state, it would require a compulsory form of military service.

This I can not stand for, and I do not believe the American people are yet ready to adopt any form of compulsory military service in this country. And if we should undertake to do that, the question comes to us, "Whose boy would you compel to enter the Army and from what classes would you recruit young men for compulsory military service?" Some would suggest one thing and some another. Some would suggest that it be done by lot. I can not believe that it is fair, just, or right to, by the toss of a coin or the drawing of a slip of paper, determine the destiny and future of any man's son. I believe everyone should have a fair and equal chance.

For the above reasons, we have decided and have reported in this bill, which I trust will be enacted into law, that which we believe is the correct military policy. As I have before stated, a small standing army, only such as is necessary to perform its functions in time of peace, and then the National Guard or trained citizens, whichever you desire to call it, which will be subject to be called into the service whenever they are needed and who will, in my judgment, be glad to respond.

But, Mr. Chairman, preparedness means a great deal more than providing for men and guns and missiles of death. Guns without ammunition would be worthless. We have been told, and there is no dispute of the fact, that we are dependent on Chile for all the nitrate that we use practically in making powder and high explosives. We are also dependent upon it for fertilizer to a large extent. Our guns and our men would be useless without it. The whole argument in favor of increasing our Army is to defend ourselves against an invasion by a foreign foe. It is on the assumption, which I do not believe will ever happen, that our Navy will be destroyed, and they will land a large force of men on our shores. If this should ever happen, we would then be cut off from our supply of nitrate, and after firing a few shots we would be without ammunition and would have nothing to do except hold up our hands and surrender.

In view of this situation, we have incorporated in this bill authority to construct a plant for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen. The Government has water powers on navigable rivers where the same is being improved for navigation, and with very little extra expense can produce enought power to supply all our needs in time of war if we should ever need it, and we would be independent of any foreign country so far as the same is concerned, and would keep an enormous amount of money now at home which goes to other countries.

This preparation would be not only for war, but the money would not be lost in times of peace. The same could be used for the production of this important element in fertilizers and could be used to enlarge our crops and would reduce, so we are told by evidence that nobody denies, the cost of fertilizer to our agricultural interests at least one-half, and would save millions and millions of dollars every year to the agricultural interests of this country and thereby enable us to produce food and clothing for the support of our people in times of peace as well as in times of war. This is the real kind of preparedness that we need in this country more than any other, and this is the kind of preparedness that the money is bringing in its returns at all times, whether in peace or in war. Therefore, I can not see why anyone should hesitate to make preparation of this kind, except they desire to work in the interest of some large corporation or trust which now control these things and make our people pay enormous prices for the same.

There is another means of preparedness that is absolutely essential, in my opinion, and is in close relationship to preparedness for the safety of this country, and that is that some means should be provided whereby people who are in this country would owe their allegiance to this Government and not to some foreign Government. There is now pending in this House a bill to restrict immigration, which I sincerely hope will pass. In fact, if we could pass a stronger bill, in my judgment it would be better, for, if we should ever have war with a foreign country we would be menaced by a large number of people in this country who owe their allegiance to a foreign Government or power, and in the event of war would have nothing to do but arm themselves and we would have an armed foe already in our country.

These and numerous other preparations, which are preparations for peace—and we expect to live in peace more than in war—are absolutely essential, in my opinion. We should have preparedness, reasonable preparedness, for war, but we should also at the same time have preparedness for peace. We want peace, but we want at the same time to maintain our honor and our dignity. But may we not hope that war will never come, and that we shall always live in peace? That when the present conflict in Europe will end that all nations will realize the futility of war and the barbarity of it, and will agree, in the interest of the whole world, to some disarmament plan whereby the enormous burdens placed on our people and on the people of the entire world in making preparations for war shall end? That they will have reached that state of civilization where they will know that honor can be maintained in other ways than by fighting, and that all people may dwell together in peace?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WISE].

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. OLNEY] is recognized.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, I trust that this amendment will be defeated and that the section as read, section 29, will be passed. It is, of course, a unanimous committee report, so far as section 29 is concerned, although there were a few dissenters in the committee at the time of the hearings.

Now, what are the ancient rights and privileges of these organizations which are referred to in section 29? One of these companies is the First Corps of Cadets of Boston, and, mind you, this company is a member of the National Guard of Massachusetts. There are two or three other organizations of that kind, to my knowledge, in various States of the Union which belong also to their National Guards. The First Corps of Cadets of Boston was instituted in 1741, antedating the Federal Constitution. It consists to-day of 1,000 men in the veteran association and 275 men, a battalion, divided into 4 companies.

One of its ancient rights and privileges, asked to be retained only in time of peace, Mr. Chairman, is that it shall have a lieutenant colonel as its commander. Other ancient rights and privileges sought and appearing in this section are that it shall retain the right to own its own armory, its own camp ground, and shall be the bodyguard of the governor. Those rights were granted away back in 1741.

This seems to me to be a matter of justice and injustice. These men want to go out with the colors in time of war, and it seems to me that their patriotism and enthusiasm should not be smothered, nor should this organization be stamped out of existence, as the passing of this amendment might accomplish.

The First Corps of Cadets has an armory in Boston, on Columbus Avenue, which it owns, at a cost of $450,000. It has a camp ground at Hingham, Mass., on the coast, which cost $150,000, and it has furnishings, ancient relics, and historical books and manuscripts in its armory in Boston to the value of $100,000. It has invested a total of about $700,000, and it would seem, if this amendment were passed, that this organization and other similar organizations which, mind you, are members of the National Guard might become extinguished. The adoption of this amendment, I claim, would destroy the patriotism and spirit of these young men who want to go out in time of war with the colors.

This First Corps of Cadets of Boston particularly has furnished 700 officers since 1765 to the Revolutionary War and to the Civil War and served as well in the Spanish-American War of 1898. It also extended relief at the time of the Chelsea fire in Massachusetts, to the Salem conflagration, and to the great fire which nearly wiped out the great city of Boston in 1872.

It also reserves as one of its rights the opportunity to purchase its own uniforms. It may be erecting, perhaps, a "house of lords," as one gentleman of our committee said, but I wish there were 47 other organizations in 47 other States of the Union which would erect their "houses of lords" and which would each furnish in time of war two or three hundred patriotic men eager to serve with the colors. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I have great respect for tradition and I have even greater respect for tradition and the glorious and ennobling service that may grow out of it when it is a source of inspiration to such patriotism and good citizenship as I know are manifest in the organization to which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. OLNEY] has just alluded. But, with all that reverence and respect for tradition originating in 1741, I am not willing to-day to send my sons and my neighbor's sons out in the line of battle in 1916 with that as their only defense.

Let us stop and consider one thing about the practical effect of the section as it is written, if it is not amended as proposed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WISE]. This very institution to which the gentleman from Massachusetts has called attention claims, among two of its privileges, first, the right to continue an independent organization as a battalion, so that if it goes into the United States service, no matter what the exigencies of that service may be, it will always be carried as a "fraction over" in any organization of the Army and can not yield itself to any proper tactical organization that the necessities of the occasion may demand; and in the next place it claims as one of its privileges the right to be commanded by a lieutenant colonel, whereas every battalion in the United States Army, every other battalion in the National Guard, is commanded by a major. The result is that this organization can not articulate itself with the Army organization and system that are demanded by modern military science. Every time this battalion is brought alongside another battalion in the Regular Army or in the National Guard its lieutenant colonel will take rank over the commander of the other unit. So that you might have on one side a lieutenant colonel in command of this battalion who perhaps has been in there 15 weeks and on the other side an old, grizzled major who has served 20 years, and if those two battalions are brought together, then the lieutenant colonel will command. By that method you would tend to upset all democracy in the Army.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is there any exception in this if the ancient company happens to be organized in the State militia?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. To the extent of federalization in uniformity with the Federal plan; yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If an artillery company or cavalry company is already in the State militia, would this amendment tend to preserve any of their rights?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It depends upon the light in which the gentleman views it. If it is already in the service of the United States, it will not be made to conform to all the organization features that other similar organizations in the United States service have unless this amendment is passed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let me get at it in this way: If it is already in the State militia, will it be subject to draft under this bill?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No; it would not come into the Federal militia unless it does conform to the organization provided.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What I want to know is whether the passage of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia will prevent these independent companies from entering the service?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Oh, no.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will it include them if they are already in the National Guard?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It will include them if they conform to the general organization.

Mr. GARDNER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WISE].

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be reported again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WISE: Amend, on page 51, section 29, line 17, by striking out at the end of the line the words "in time of war" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "when in the service of the United States."

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment. I rather marvel that no gentleman from the State of Massachusetts has as yet risen to regret audibly the passage from our military rosters of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Boston.

Mr. Chairman, the passage from our annals and from our newspaper columns of that particular organization ought to be a source of regret to every reader of the New York Sun. We shall miss from the yearly résumé the statement in that and other newspapers concerning the exchange of fraternal visits between the Ancient and Honorable Artillery of Boston and the Ancient and Honorable Artillery of London, and similar useful, ancient, honorable, and traditional forces.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes. I am glad to hear some voice from Massachusetts raised in their behalf. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROGERS. What leads the gentleman to think that the passage of this bill will have the slightest effect upon those social, not to say convivial, occasions to which he refers?

Mr. BENNET. Oh, I do not agree at all with the gentleman from Massachusetts that this ancient and honorable organization is merely social and convivial, and I am ashamed that a gentleman from Massachusetts should describe them as social and convivial. They are real men—men of capacity. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Physical or mental?

Mr. BENNET. I do not have to go into details as to their capacity. Anyone who is familiar with the past history of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery of Boston will agree with me that they are men of capacity, and I regret that any gentleman from Massachusetts, that State of splendid military traditions, should even by inference criticize a body which is as much a part of the history of his State and as well known in the United States as the sacred cod on the statehouse. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALDWELL. Does the gentleman realize that there are two organizations in the State of New York which will be preserved under the section as it stands, but will be destroyed by the amendment if it is adopted?

Mr. BENNET. Then I am not in favor of the amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman name the two New York organizations? They are very happily situated between Boston and Philadelphia, where we also have an ancient company, and I should like to know when we may expect to fraternize with New York.

Mr. BENNET. Our military organizations do not exist for the purpose of fraternizing. They are real military organizations, which exist for the purpose of doing the work of the Nation and the State, and I do not have to rise to defend them at all. My colleague does it far better than I.

Mr. OLNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. OLNEY. I am speaking for the benefit of those military organizations which already belong to the National Guard, and while I appreciate the splendid qualifications of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company, generally these organizations are not members of the National Guard.

Mr. BENNET. I am glad that the gentleman from Massachusetts has come to their defense. Now, if I may have a few minutes more, I just want to call attention to the fact that there is a loophole—a rather sorry loophole, I am afraid—which may assure the continuance of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery, and that is the explanation of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] in relation to section 26 in reply to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN]. That section provides—

That no State shall maintain troops in time of peace other than as prescribed in accordance with the organization prescribed under this act.

Now, I want the Ancient and Honorable Artillery preserved, and if they are not troops I will be satisfied with the statement of the gentleman from Virginia that the Texas Rangers are not troops, although they are very valorous, active contestants.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will say to the gentleman from New York that it is a long time since I have had any personal contact with the Ancient and Honorable Artillery, but when I did I thought they were in an excellent state of preservation. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. I have rejected the testimony of every other man in this House as to the capacity of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery of Boston, but I accept the statement of the gentleman from Texas as an expert witness. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. All debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I want to be recognized in favor of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask unanimous consent for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, to show the serious effect of this amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. WISE], it means that all of these ancient military organizations shall maintain their individuality when they are not actually called upon by the United States to serve. The amendment eliminates any conflict that may occur when the President, under the provisions of this bill, calls upon the National Guard for maneuvering purposes in the summer. Now, while they are not actually called into the service of the United States, they maintain their organization. That is to say, they can have their rose water sprinkled in the bath, their cocktails, and all other things that they use in their social and military organization; but when they are called upon by the United States to go out into the training camps in the summer for maneuvering purposes they leave all their valets and rose water, and so forth, at home and go out into the field as an ordinary, everyday, democratic American soldier. [Laughter.] That is what the amendment means, and nothing else. If you do not adopt the amendment, you extend privileges to these ancient organizations that no other military men in this country can enjoy. In other words, they will go out under the same conditions as the boys in New York and Pennsylvania that have not got the money to belong to these social organizations. They will drink black coffee, eat corn bread and salt bacon like other folks eat. It puts them on the same plane where, in the event that there is actual war, they will know how to subsist on plain food as an ordinary human being. [Laughter.] If you do not vote this amendment into this bill, you are extending the privileges to these organizations that will enjoy the benefits of the appropriation accruing under the bill without being subject to the rules and regulations of the regularly established National Guard. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, one of the privileges that will be preserved by the passage of this paragraph as it relates to organizations like the City Troop of Philadelphia, which was organized in 1774, would be to preserve to one of the officers the title of cornet. That is one of the ancient privileges that would thus be protected.

And with respect to this title, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that the man who held it, not in those halcyon days to which my friend from Georgia refers, but who held it in the dark days of the Civil War, was no less a man than my distinguished predecessor from the third congressional district of Pennsylvania, the Hon. Samuel J. Randall, who for many years occupied the Speaker's chair with great honor. [Applause.] He was the same man that advanced from the title of cornet, which he held at the beginning of the Civil War, to the title of captain of the City Troop, which he held at Gettysburg. As cornet or as captain he served with great credit, not only to the troop but to the United States.

This ancient and honorable troop of Philadelphia—and we have others—was the first of its kind in this country.

It has preserved its organization from the days of George Washington down to those of Woodrow Wilson. It began with the Colonies and continued on through the whole period of the Union of States. It has received and escorted every President of the United States who has done us the honor to come to the ancient and honorable city of Philadelphia. I wish to say that that troop not only participated in every war of the United States, except the Mexican War, in which the Cavalry was not called, but during the course of the Civil War it furnished upward of 64 officers to the Union Army, 6 of whom lost their lives in the service of their country. You can not ignore a record like that.

Now, it seems to me that rather than belittle it we should encourage that inspiration, that sentiment, which has been so slightingly referred to here in the discussion with respect to organizations of this kind. If we have men of means who will organize these companies which, when called by the President of the United States, will serve as this troop did in the Revolutionary War, the Civil War, and the Spanish War, it is highly creditable. It seems to me that we ought not to disparage the men who are willing to offer their services to their country, even if they do have a little good fellowship along with it. If we had some more of that same good fellowship amongst the rank and file of the Army, it would be very helpful to the Army. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the record of the First City Troop of Philadelphia.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has that privilege.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FIRST TROOP, PHILADELPHIA CITY CAVALRY, IN THE SERVICE OF THE UNITED STATES.

[Compiled from the Troop History.]

"1774. Organized November 17, 1774, by 28 gentlemen pledged to the side of the Colonies, who armed and equipped themselves as a troop of light horse. The troop is the oldest organization in the United States that has maintained a continuous active military existence and taken part in every war in which volunteer cavalry have served.

"Of the 28 gentlemen who organized the troop, known first as the Light Horse of the city of Philadelphia, 23 were members of the Gloucester Fox Hunting Club, which had been in existence since 1766.

"The present title of the organization has been used since 1815, and the existing full-dress uniform dates from about the same time, with some changes.

"1775–1783. The troop was in service as a volunteer command throughout the War of Independence. It paraded, under command of Capt. Markoe, the first captain, in a review by Gen. Washington June 20, 1775, and took part, under his successor, Capt. Samuel Morris, elected captain in 1776, in all the military operations in the vicinity of Philadelphia. It was engaged in the Battles of Trenton, Princeton, Brandywine, and Germantown, and was honored by Gen. Washington with personal letters of thanks in 1777 and 1780.

"1787. On September 14, 1787, Gen. Washington in Philadelphia as the president of the convention for framing a constitution for the Union honored the troop by being its guest at a dinner given in his honor at the City Tavern.

"1794. Under Capt. Dunlap, the fifth captain, and in the command of President Washington, the troop took part in the campaign to suppress the uprising of 1794 in western Pennsylvania, known as the whisky insurrection.

"1799. The troop, called into service by President Adams, was on duty from March 21, 1799, until April 25, 1799, marching under command of Capt. Dunlap, with other cavalry commands, into northeastern Pennsylvania at the time of the disturbances of 1799, known as Fries's rebellion.

"1812–1814. In the second war with Great Britain, after the burning of the City of Washington, the troop was in service, under Capt. Ross, the seventh captain, for four months in 1814 in Maryland, engaged in watching the coast in view of an expected attack on Baltimore. Capt. Ross died in Philadelphia in 1817 while in command of the troop.

"1847–48. In the War with Mexico the troop did not take part as a body, as no volunteer cavalry commands were accepted. Several members received commissions in the Regular Army. Of these Capt. Butler, the eleventh captain of the troop, and who had received a captain's commission in the Third Regiment, United States Dragoons, died in Mexico.

"1861–1865. In the Civil War, under command of Capt. James, the twelfth captain, the troop was the only volunteer cavalry accepted under the first call of President Lincoln for three months' service, and was mustered in on May 13, 1861.

"When the troop was mustered out 47 members of the active roll received commissions in the volunteer and regular service. In addition, eight members from the nonactive and honorary rolls had received commissions before the close of the year 1861. In 1863, under the call of the President, the troop was again in service, under the command of Cornet Samuel J. Randall, from June 18 until mustered out on July 31, 1863, and took part in the campaign preceding the Battle of Gettysburg.

"During the course of the war the troop furnished in all a total of upward of 64 officers to the Union Army from among its members, and of these 6 lost their lives on the battle field.

"1898. In the Spanish-American War every man on the active roll of the troop volunteered for service in the United States Volunteers. Under Capt. Groome, the nineteenth captain, the troop, on April 28, 1898, left for Mount Gretna, Pa., and there was sworn into the United States service on May 7, 1898. It took part in the Porto Rico expedition, sailing from Newport News July 28 on the transport Massachusetts to join Gen. Brookes's command.

"The troop was the first volunteer troop to be landed on the island, and remained there until September 3, when it returned to the United States on the transport Mississippi, arriving in New York on September 10, 1898, and was discharged from the United States service in Philadelphia on November 21, 1898.

"1905. On February 22, 1905, President Roosevelt was the guest of the troop at luncheon at the armory.

"1909. On February 22, 1909, President-elect Taft was the guest of the troop at luncheon at the armory.

IN THE SERVICE OF THE COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA.

"Under a requisition of the governor the troop, under command of Capt. Hart, the tenth captain, was on active duty at Harrisburg from December 8 until January 1, 1839.

"Under Capt. Snowden, the fifteenth captain, during the railroad riots, from July 20 until August 5, 1877.

"Under Capt. Joseph Lapsley Wilson, the seventeenth captain, during the riots at Homestead, from July 11 until July 27, 1892.

"Under Capt. John C. Groome during the disturbances in Hazelton, from September 11 until September 28, 1897.

"Under Capt. Groome at Tamaqua and Panther Valley during the disturbances in the coal regions for 35 days, from October 8 until November 12, 1902.

"In addition to the above the troop has been called upon many times in local disturbances of the peace in the city and county of Philadelphia.

NOTES.

"At this date, November 17, 1913, the troop is under the command of its twentieth captain, J. Franklin McFadden, and has on its active, nonactive, and honorary rolls 224 members, of whom 69 are on the active roll.

"Since its organization, during the 139 years to November 17, 1913, the troop has elected and enrolled 1,124 members as troopers, and the officers elected in that period, without exception, have all first served in the ranks.

"The original troop standard, presented by Capt. Markoe in 1775, and now preserved at the armory, Twenty-third and Ranstead Streets, is the earliest example of the 13 stripes being used on an American banner, and is acknowledged by flag historians to possess the best claim to having been the inspiration for our national flag. The present standard carried by the troop in full dress was presented by honorary Capt. Hart in 1876 and is a copy of the old standard.

"It is an ancient privilege of the troop to act as escort to the President of the United States whenever an official visit is paid to Philadelphia. This service has been rendered to 4 Presidents on 12 different occasions since 1900 to November 17, 1913.

"The troop, in its full-dress uniform, takes the right of the line in all parades of ceremony, this custom being recognized in the militia laws of the State as one of the rights reserved to the organization."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to close debate—because we have wasted half an hour here—on this section and all amendments thereto in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS). The gentleman from Virginia moves to close debate on the section and all amendments thereto in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, if it were not already organized no one would think of organizing the Massachusetts First Corps of Cadets as part of the National Guard, except under the same regulations as the rest of the guard. The gentleman from Georgia is right about that. But that is not the situation. The First Corps has been organized ever since 1741, and in the 175 years which have elapsed since then it has gathered around it a good deal of property, a wealth of tradition, and a few special privileges which the corps asks to retain. Let us examine these privileges. There are three of them. First, it is the governor's bodyguard. Second, it is commanded by a lieutenant colonel instead of by a major. Third, it can not be attached to the command of anyone below the rank of a major general. Now, if the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia is adopted the corps must either have one organization for summer use and another organization for winter use or else it must become a battalion of infantry of the line, and the ownership of all its property, including its armory, would at once be involved in confusion.

The First Corps of Cadets is practically an officers' training school; that I will admit. Nevertheless, the enlisted men of the corps are required to perform exactly the same services as other enlisted men in the militia. Furthermore, the corps has turned out a marvelous lot of officers in its day.

The corps has had a continuous existence, except that the British governor dissolved it in 1774, when John Hancock was lieutenant colonel in command. It was thought that the corps was training officers for the Minute Men, which unquestionably was the case.

I am informed that this organization in its 175 years of existence has furnished over 600 officers to the State of Massachusetts and to the United States. In the Civil War, first and last, it furnished 150 officers for the Union Army.

As to the statement of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] respecting self-indulgence, there is nothing in that contention. The membership is almost ascetic as compared with the organization of the militia in which I myself served. It is as hard working a military organization as there is in Massachusetts.

Let me read now from the recent report of James Regan, captain of the Thirtieth Infantry, United States Army. This is the 1915 report. It says:

The First Corps of Cadets is a splendid organization and one that will give a good account of themselves when called into service. Control of officers and noncommissioned officers over enlisted men excellent, more so than any other National Guard I have seen, due, no doubt, to the excellent personnel of this organization. One month's field training as the organization now stands would make the command efficient for field service. The encouraging features are its personnel and enthusiasm with which they enter into their military work; a fine training school for officers.

Year after year that is the nature of the report which is made of the First Corps of Cadets of the Massachusetts Volunteer Militia.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, this section as it is written in the bill affects about seven organizations throughout the whole United States. Many of these organizations were formed prior to the time of the Revolutionary War. They gave officers and men to the Union every time the country became involved in war. They simply desire to continue their organizations in the years to come. They have their histories, they have their traditions, they have many things that cause them to feel proud of the organizations of which they are members. They naturally do not want them destroyed as such. They are willing in time of war to become a part of the National Guard of the United States; they are willing to conform to all of the conditions of this bill in time of war, but in time of peace they simply seek to be allowed to continue the organizations as they now exist. I do not see that any great harm is going to be done to the country if that be allowed. I can see where much good can come to the country if these patriotic citizens be allowed to continue these organizations of which they are personally proud. I sincerely hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WISE] will be voted down, and that the provision may be allowed to stand as it is in the bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 30. That for the purpose of maintaining appropriate organization and to assist in instruction and training, the President may assign the National Guard of the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia to divisions, brigades, and other tactical units, and may detail officers of appropriate grade either from the National Guard or the Regular Army to command such units.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by substituting a colon for the period at the end of paragraph 30 and adding the following:

"Provided, That there shall be appointed in each State an adjutant general, who shall be an officer of the National Guard with rank of brigadier general. The office of the adjutant general shall be the office of record and administration for the militia of each State, except when such militia has been called into the service of the United States. In addition to his duties as prescribed by the laws of such State, such adjutant general shall make such returns and reports to the Secretary of War, at such times and in such form as the latter shall from time to time prescribe. The adjutant general shall be appointed from among officers on the active list of the National Guard of their respective States who shall have had not less than five years' prior service as commissioned officers of the National Guard or in the Regular Army, or both combined: Provided further, That the adjutant general of the Territories and of the District of Columbia shall be appointed by the President with such rank and qualifications as he may deem proper."

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment was presented to me by the adjutant general of the State of Ohio. I do not know what other arrangements they may have made. This simply takes care of these pompous gentlemen to whom the gentleman from Massachusetts referred. It places some qualifications around the adjutants general of the various States. They are appointed by the governors of the States and have to have some military service either in the Regular Army or in the State militia of the various States. I believe there should be some restrictions thrown around the appointment of an adjutant general, that he should have some qualifications, that he should not be a politician; yet at the same time I believe, and still insist, that the National Guard of the State is the force that we must finally depend upon, and I want to say while I am on this subject that Secretary Garrison promulgated the proposition of a continental army. It was rejected by the public and he resigned from the President's Cabinet, and the President appointed a man from my own town, who is known as a man of peace, and yet you are trying to write into this bill the continental army under another name. You are taking away from the National Guard of the various States practically all the rights that they have and placing them in the President and the officers of the Regular Army, and the vociferous way in which my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] is defending this bill leads me to believe that it is a little bit inclined along the line of the continental army.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein a table with reference to the officers and force of the Signal Corps, prepared in accordance with the schedule submitted in the report of the Secretary of War, and I do this as a supplement to my remarks upon the subject yesterday, and in the permanent RECORD desire to have the table incorporated with those remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein a table. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to return to section 26, line 23, and having the Clerk read an amendment. It is thought by some people who are interested in the State constabulary and State police that the section may interfere with them, and I therefore offer the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to return to the section indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 49, at the end of line 23, after the period and following the word "peace," insert:

"And provided further, That nothing contained in this act shall prevent the organization and maintenance of a State police or constabulary."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the amendment; I accept the amendment.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman, at this stage——

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the whole section.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that motion has been made and voted down.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to discuss the amendment when the time comes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this section and the other sections of the bill absolutely destroy the National Guard. This section reads:

SEC. 26. That no State shall maintain troops in time of peace other than as authorized in accordance with the organization prescribed under this act: Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed as limiting the rights of the States and Territories to the use of the National Guard within their respective borders in time of peace.

It is contended that the Constitution authorizes Congress to do this. That contention is based upon section 10, article 1, which reads:

No State shall, without the consent of Congress, * * * keep troops * * * in time of peace.

Very well, considering that this refers to the Organized Militia; yet because the Constitution gives Congress the option of consenting or not consenting to the maintenance of a militia or National Guard is no reason or argument why we should forbid it; and it seems to me, in the event that any State in the Union should be unable to comply with the very rigid requirements of this bill, that the National Guard of that State would get no pay from the United States and the State would have to maintain them. But this very clause absolutely forbids the State from maintaining any troops of any kind. Therefore you say to the National Guard, You must do as required by this law or else go out of existence, and the State is even forbidden to maintain them at their own expense. Now, that is a kind of military preparedness I can not understand, and it has not been explained in this debate; and I give you this warning, that it seems to me we are liable to destroy the whole National Guard of a State by stringent requirements and by this prohibition preventing the State from maintaining any troops whatever at their own expense. I doubt whether section 10, article 1, above referred to, when construed together with the other provisions of the Constitution in regard to the militia, gives Congress any such power. The proposed amendment does not go far enough. The whole section should go out.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Do I understand the Chair ruled the motion to strike out the section is out of order because it has already been passed upon once by the committee?

Mr. HAY. It has already been voted on by the committee.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be recognized to ask a question, if I may, and therefore move to strike out the last word of the amendment. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] if he will be so kind as to answer; as I understand the theory upon which this bill is drawn, it is this: The United States Government is going to give certain financial assistance to the States that comply with this act. In other words, if States create a National Guard organization in accordance with the terms of this act, then financial aid is given to those organizations through the State. It presupposes, however, that if the State does not avail itself of the privileges of this act that there might still remain some organizations in the State. Therefore is it the intention of this paragraph to legislate out of existence those organizations which do not comply with the provisions of this act?

Mr. HAY. No; it is not, and gentlemen, in my opinion, are giving themselves a great deal of uneasiness about nothing. It is not intended to legislate out of existence any organization whatever. It simply provides that when they do have an organization it shall be organized under the provisions of this act—that is, shall be organized in troops, companies, batteries, as are provided for by the act. If they do not want to receive the pay under this act, why, then they do not get it, but it does not prevent them from going on and organizing anything they please.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The language is, "No State shall maintain troops." It does not say "organize."

Mr. HAY. Unless they are organized as this act provides, organization meaning that they shall be in troops, companies, batteries, and regiments in the same manner that the Regular Army organizes its organizations.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Well, I will say to the gentleman, I think there is some force to the viewpoint he has expressed, but I am not at all convinced that his viewpoint is well taken.

Mr. HAY. The only object, I will say to the gentleman, is to get uniformity of organization throughout the country and not to have different organizations, one in one State and another organization in another State, but to make it uniform; that is all.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is very true; but we might very properly specify we will give this financial assistance only to organizations that do comply with the general plan.

Mr. HAY. Exactly.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. But does the gentleman think Congress has power to say that a State shall not maintain any other kind of military force if it sees fit to do so?

Mr. HAY. Of course, Congress has the power, because the Constitution confers it. The Constitution provides that no State shall maintain troops without the consent of Congress, therefore Congress has all the power, but Congress is not taking away from the State the right to have organizations. We simply say to them, "You must organize in accordance with the organization prescribed under this act"; that is all.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, suppose the State of Wisconsin should refuse to have the number of drills required under this bill. They would not get Federal aid, but they could still maintain their troops——

Mr. HAY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. REILLY. They could still maintain troops, but they would not come in under the bill?

Mr. HAY. They would not get any money.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the word "to" in line 21 of page 49, in that very section. Does not the gentleman believe that the preposition "in" would be a better word there?

Mr. HAY. In what line?

Mr. KAHN. In line 21:

Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed as limiting the rights of the States and Territories in the use——

Mr. HAY. I have no objection to that, and I will offer an amendment later on.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 31. That the States and Territories shall have the right to determine and fix the location of the units and headquarters of the National Guard within their respective borders: Provided, That no organization of the National Guard which is entitled to and shall have received compensation under the provisions of this act shall be disbanded without the consent of Congress, nor, without such consent, shall the commissioned or enlisted strength of any such organization be reduced below the minimum that shall be prescribed therefor by the President.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS). The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

"And provided further, That no part of any appropriation made under or by virtue of this act, after the year 1920, shall be used for the purpose of compensating any organization of the National Guard or any of the officers or enlisted men thereof in any State or Territory which shall use or shall by law otherwise permit or provide for the use of its National Guard or any part thereof in connection with any strike of the employees on any railroad, or in any mine or factory, who shall strike for the purpose of obtaining increase of wages or change of terms or conditions of any employment."

Mr. HAY. I make a point of order on that, Mr. Chairman. The Chair ruled on that previously.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the Chair did not rule on that. I ask the gentleman to withhold the amendment until the Chairman of the committee who made the ruling can be sent for.

Mr. HAY. Will the Chair have that paragraph passed without prejudice until the Chairman of the committee returns?

The CHAIRMAN. I will just ask you to withhold it until we can get the permanent Chairman of the committee, who has ruled on this proposition before.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the paragraph be passed over.

Mr. HAY. Do not let us pass over anything. We will never get through if we do.

Mr. KAHN. We can read the next section until the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] can return to the Chamber.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the paragraph shall be passed temporarily, until the Chairman of the committee returns to the Chamber. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 32. That hereafter the period of enlistment of enlisted men in the National Guard shall be for six years—three years with the colors and three years in the reserve—and such enlisted men shall be subject to the same qualifications as are now or may hereafter be prescribed for admission to the Regular Army, and upon the expiration of three years' service with the colors enlisted men may be permitted to reenlist under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, and at the end of said period of enlistment, or when otherwise entitled to an honorable discharge, said enlisted men shall be entitled to a certificate of discharge setting forth the character of the service performed.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 52, line 18, after the word "reenlist," insert the words "for periods of three years with the colors," and after the word "enlistment," in line 20, insert the words "or enlistments."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 52, line 19: Strike out all in the section after the word "prescribe" and insert:
"Provided, That an enlisted man discharged from service shall receive a discharge in writing in such form and with such classification as is prescribed for the Regular Army, and in time of peace discharges may be given prior to the expiration of terms of enlistment upon the permanent removal of a soldier beyond the limits of an organization to which he belongs because of his engagement in business such as precludes him from properly preforming his military duties and upon the certificate of a medical officer or reputable physician that he has become permanently incapacitated from military service."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of calling the attention of the chairman of the committee to a difficulty which apparently is inherent to the section.

I am very much in favor of the Gardner amendment, which the committee adopted yesterday, and which I hope will remain in the bill, because I believe it will tend to give us a better permanent Army. But, of course, there is an apparent, at least, discrepancy between this provision and that amendment. There are now between 400,000 and 500,000 foreign-born men in the United States who will advise their sons, their American-born sons, to join the Regular Army if the Gardner amendment stays in the bill, and those are the men who have had training in European armies, who are familiar with the advantages and disadvantages of the training, who know the advantage there is to the physique and to the mind by the training; and who, on the other hand, realize the disadvantage that comes from the longer military duty in those European countries. I want to see that amendment preserved, and at the same time I want to see the National Guard preserved. Now, either here or in some other place these matters ought to be harmonized so that the——

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman from New York permit a suggestion?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. HAY. Does not the gentleman from New York understand that the training in the National Guard is very different from the training in the Regular Army, and that if you provide that the members of the National Guard shall leave the guard at the end of the year you practically have given them very little training? I want to say to the gentleman that this term has been agreed upon by all the officers of the National Guard as being the shortest in which they could properly train a man to be a soldier under the system which prevails in the National Guard.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, there is a good deal of wisdom in what the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] says, as there always is, and I do recognize the fact that there is a difference in the training; but I want to call the attention of the committee to what I think is rather a fine thing, and that is that by the Gardner amendment, which we adopted yesterday, we have increased our ability tremendously to get the men who may be called experts—because these 400,000 or 500,000 men have had military training—to advise their sons to go into our Army for one year's service; and many of them will go.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I simply desire to ask the gentleman from New York if he has read the statement of Miss Jane Addams in the hearings in connection with the statement that he is now making, that the people who come from foreign countries are anxious to have their children take military training. If the gentleman has not read that testimony, I advise him to read the testimony of Miss Jane Addams.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, Miss Jane Addams is my warm, personal friend, and I regard her very highly, but I decline to admit her as a military expert, although I am in favor of woman suffrage. So long as men do the fighting I insist upon going to men—and I am talking about men—for advice as to the proper way to build up the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. In relation to these native-born sons of these foreign-born soldiers, I want to say that there is no more enthusiastically loyal or American class in the United States than they to-day. The most popular song to-day in the city of New York is a crude, lilting song called "America, I love you," written by a Jewish boy not 20 years of age, whose parents came from Koveno not 22 years ago. He lives almost on the site of George Washington's headquarters. The chorus of that song is that—

There's a hundred million others like me.

To my mind, that expresses the loyal attitude of this class of young men who will be encouraged to go into the American Army if this Gardner amendment goes in; and they can go in and stay a year and get the military training and come out.

The song I mentioned runs in full, as follows:

Amid fields of clover,
'Twas just a little over
A hundred years ago,
A handful of strangers,
They faced many dangers
To make their country grow.
It's now quite a Nation
Of wond'rous population,
And free from every king;
Its your land, it's my land,
A great do-or-die land,
And that's just why I sing.

CHORUS.

America, I love you,
You're like a sweetheart of mine;
From ocean to ocean,
For you my devotion
Is touching each bound'ry line.
Just like a little baby
Climbing it's mother's knee;
America, I love you,
And there's a hundred million others like me.

From all sorts of places
They welcomed all the races
To settle on their shore;
They didn't care which one,
The poor or the rich one,
They still had room for more.
To give them protection
By popular election
A set of laws they chose;
They're your laws and my laws,
For your cause and my cause,
That's why this country rose.

And Mr. Rosenberg, of New York, writes me about it and the author:

NEW YORK, N. Y., March 1, 1916.

Hon. WILLIAM S. BENNET,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The young man who wrote the song "America I Love You" is Archie Gottler, and he will be 20 years of age on the 14th day of May, 1916. He was born at 31 Henry Street, between Market and Catharine Streets, in the Borough of Manhattan, New York City. This is now the election district of which I am the captain, the eleventh election district of the second assembly district. This is only a few blocks from where Washington had his headquarters at Cherry Hill.

His parents came to this country about 21 years ago from Kovno, Russian Poland.

With best wishes, I am,
Sincerely, yours, ELY ROSENBERG.

Mr. Chairman, this crude song, which is set to catchy music, is sung every day in some one of our public schools, not because of its literary merit, but because its intense patriotism expresses the views of our population. The foreign-born citizen is patriotic and American.

One day, just after the present European war started I was in a crockery store on the Bowery in New York City. Out of curiosity I asked a young man sitting there where he was from, and when he said Przemysl we naturally talked about the great struggle then going on for the possession of that stronghold.

He expressed a natural hope for the success of the country where he had been born, but said, "I am an American now, this is my country. It treats me well. This is the country in which I am interested." And he had been here but one and one-half years.

On Washington's Birthday this year there was an oratorical contest in the Dubuque German College in Dubuque, Iowa. One of the contestants was a Hungarian not yet three years in this country. His oration was a eulogy of Washington and a remarkable analysis of what the past achievements and future prospects of America were and are.

He closed with this sentiment:

The principles of America are right, and because they are right I would fight for them—even against the land of my birth.

That is the sentiment of our foreign born. They are Americans. Ours is their land of hope and they tenderly cherish American ideals, while striving for their betterment, conscious that with all our defects ours is still the best experiment in government and the nearest approach to a people's government that there is.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The privilege is already granted. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 41. That an enlisted reserve corps of the National Guard shall be organized in each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia, to consist of enlisted men of the National Guard furloughed to the reserve corps after having completed the term of active service required by the enlistment contract hereinbefore prescribed, honorably discharged enlisted men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps of the United States, and honorably discharged enlisted men of the National Guard of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia who have or shall have served with record "good" or better for a period equal to not less than three years.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday we adopted a very important amendment to this bill, which amendment added very materially to the strength of the Regular Army, by increasing the reserve force of the Regular Army. I refer to the amendment permitting an enlisted man in the Regular Army, who enlists for three years' active service, to pass to the reserve at the end of one year from enlistment upon the recommendation of his commanding officer, and at the end of two years at his option. To my mind this amendment adds great strength to the fighting force of the country by greatly increasing the number in the reserve force, which is subject to call at any time when there is an emergency. By shortening this service it will not only add to the reserve strength of the Regular Army, but it will encourage men to enlist in the Regular Army who, in my opinion, would not enlist where the service is for three or four years. It has been almost the universal opinion of gentlemen on this floor, that even with the present limited Army, enlistments can not be secured to fill the number authorized. I am of the opinion that the amendment adopted by this House will greatly stimulate these voluntary enlistments, and under this amendment the Army will be materially strengthened and without greatly added expense.

I desire to inquire if there is any reason why this section of the bill should not contain this same principle and that the length of service in the National Guard could not be reduced, thus giving a greater reserve to this department of the Army?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman understand that in the Regular Army the soldier receives military training every day in his life, while in the National Guard, under this bill, at best, if he takes all the drills, he gets only 48 drills in a year? Therefore, in order to make him an efficient soldier, you ought to allow him to continue in the National Guard for the full three years.

Mr. DOWELL. I concede that he should be efficient, but from the facts brought out in the discussion on the amendment yesterday relating to the Regular Army, I was merely making the inquiry as to whether or not he may become efficient in a shorter time than is prescribed in this section of the bill; we want the reserve in the Regular Army and in the National Guard to be efficient, just as efficient as those in the active service.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I regret to have to consume any more time, but it does seem to me there is something in what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] says. It is very true that in order to give the national guardsman the training he should have he should surely have the three years. But we are providing here for a reserve, and it seems to me that if a man has served one year under the Gardner amendment, adopted yesterday, he ought to be made eligible for that reserve.

Mr. HAY. Does the gentleman from Connecticut believe that after a man has served one year in the National Guard he ought to be given the option to be turned into the reserve?

Mr. TILSON. Not at all. The gentleman did not apprehend what I said. I said that after he had been honorably discharged from the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States, after one year's service surely he should be eligible for this reserve.

Mr. HAY. It seems to me the gentleman wants all reserve and no Army. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILSON. No; I want as much reserve as we can get, and it seems to me that after a man has had a year's service in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps he should be eligible for this reserve, because in another section of the bill we have provided that he should be turned into the reserve after one year's service in the Regular Army. Certainly I do not think he should be turned into the reserve after one year's service in the National Guard.

Mr. HAY. This provision says that a man shall go into the reserve. What does the gentleman propose?

Mr. TILSON. As I read the language of this section, we provide here that after a man has served three years in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps he may go into the enlisted reserve of the National Guard.

Mr. HAY. What is the objection to that?

Mr. TILSON. I have no objection to that, but after a man has served one year in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps——

Mr. HAY. I know; but it would be abrogating the law which directs that after serving one year in the Regular Army he goes into the Regular Army reserve.

Mr. TILSON. After a man has served one year with the colors he may go into the Regular Army enlisted reserve. Assuming that he is still within military age, why should he not be permitted, after having served that one year, and his full term in the Regular Army reserve—to go into the National Guard reserve?

Mr. HAY. He is. The gentleman does not understand the language of the bill.

Mr. TILSON. It says he must have three years' service.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Under the Gardner amendment if a man serves one year, and is proclaimed an efficient soldier, he is furloughed to the reserve for six years.

Mr. TILSON. That is right.

Mr. KAHN. And at the end of his entire term of enlistment he may still reenlist and continue in the Regular Army reserve. Now, why should he change from one reserve into another reserve? He is still a reservist, and the country gets the benefit of his military training.

Mr. HAY. I call the attention of my friend from Connecticut to the fact that in section 41 it provides what men may go into this National Guard reserve. They are men who serve two years in the National Guard, and, then, another class, honorably discharged enlisted men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman does not understand that the three years' qualification relates back to those who have served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps?

Mr. HAY. Not at all.

Mr. TILSON. Perhaps I am mistaken, but the omission of a single comma will give it that meaning.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 43. That, except as otherwise specifically provided in this act, no commissioned or enlisted reservist of the National Guard shall receive any pay or allowances out of any appropriation made by Congress for militia purposes.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers a committee amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 57 insert as a new section, after section 43, the following:

"That when the National Guard and the enlisted reserve thereof of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia is in the service of the United States in time of war there shall be immediately organized in such State, Territory, or District one reserve battalion for each regiment of Infantry, Cavalry, Field Artillery, or four companies of Coast Artillery ordered into the service of the United States and such reserve battalion or Coast Artillery companies shall constitute the fourth battalion of any such regiment. Reserve battalions shall consist of four companies of such strength as may be prescribed by the President of the United States. When three or more regiments of the National Guard of any State, Territory, or District are in the service of the United States, the reserve battalions of such regimens may be organized into provisional regiments and higher units. If for any reason there are not enough voluntary enlistments to keep the reserve battalions at the prescribed strength a sufficient number of the unorganized militia shall be called into the service of the United States to maintain each of such battalions at its proper strength. As vacancies occur in any National Guard organization in the service of the United States, from death or other causes, men shall be transferred from the reserve battalions to the organizations in the field so that such organizations may be maintained at war strength. Officers for the reserve battalions or Coast Artillery companies provided for herein shall be assigned from the officers' reserve corps of the National Guard or Coast Artillery companies, such officers to be selected, if practicable, from the State in which the battalions are organized. Officers and noncommissioned officers returned to their home stations because of their inability to perform active field service may be assigned to the reserve battalion for duty, and all soldiers invalided home shall be assigned to and carried on the rolls of the reserve battalion until returned to duty or until discharged."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, this proposition was prepared by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] and was presented to the committee after we had perfected the bill. The committee thought it was a very excellent provision, to provide for the recruiting of these regiments in time of war when the regiments were in the field. During the Civil War there was a great deal of trouble about that, and if this is done the trouble which then occurred will be obviated.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this seems to be rather an important provision, and we can not tell from hearing it read just what it does.

Mr. HAY. In time of war when a regiment from Illinois is in the service of the United States, as soon as that regiment goes to the field it is provided in this amendment that the battalions of that regiment shall at once be enlisted, so that there will be at home troops to take care of any situation which may arise in the State, and also soldiers who can be sent to the front to take the place of those killed or disabled or who are sick without having to wait until that occurs before recruiting is begun for that particular regiment.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. When you take in the National Guard you take them in as men and not as organizations?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The organization theoretically still exists in the State?

Mr. HAY. It theoretically exists in the field. You see this is a war proposition.

Mr. MANN. I understand. You have called the men in as men, have you not?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. You have drafted them?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I suppose theoretically the organization may still exist in the State?

Mr. HAY. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. Now, can you require the State to fill up that organization?

Mr. HAY. No.

Mr. MANN. You just authorize it?

Mr. HAY. You authorize the President to do it. It is in time of war, and we authorize him to draft, if necessary, to fill up these reserve battalions, so that when the necessity arises these battalions can be sent right to the front to take the place of the battalions which have been depleted or destroyed.

Mr. MANN. I see the purpose of it, but I was trying to get at how you went at it.

Mr. HAY. They may be drilled at home, of course.

Mr. MANN. What authority can the President have to fill up a National Guard regiment in a State?

Mr. HAY. Congress can confer upon him authority in time of war to draft men for any purpose, and that is what this does, just as he drafts the National Guard in time of war.

Mr. MANN. Are they paid as the other guardsmen are at other times?

Mr. HAY. They would be; yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. In time of peace there would not be any reserve battalion.

Mr. HAY. No; there would not be any reserve battalion in time of peace.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. And in war time they would get the same pay as soldiers in the field.

Mr. MANN. Would they get the same pay as soldiers in the field?

Mr. HAY. Yes; in time of war they would.

Mr. TILSON. It would be practically recruiting for that particular regiment?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is not this practically the English system?

Mr. HAY. I understand it is.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I understand it is practically an exact copy of the English system.

Mr. HAY. It is a very excellent idea.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the General Staff, in its report on the organization of the land forces of the United States, says:

It is the experience of modern warfare that any given unit loses at least 50 per cent of its strength in the first six months of war.

This amendment provides a method of replacing this loss when the National Guard is ordered into the service of the United States in time of war.

I obtained the idea on which this amendment is based from the statutes of Arizona, which provide for the organization of a reserve battalion. Let me quote from the military code of Arizona:

SEC. 49. The National Guard reserve shall be organized into a battalion of four companies, which shall be known as the reserve battalion.

SEC. 53. Members of the reserve battalion may be called into the service of the State of Arizona to attend maneuvers or in case of invasion or threatened invasion. But in case the National Guard, or any portion of the National Guard, is called into the service of the United States as many enlisted men as wish may at once transfer to the organization so ordered into the service, preference being given to the men whose previous service has been in the same arm of the service as that ordered out, until the organization shall have the maximum number of men allowed by law. The governor shall at once issue orders for the recruiting of the reserve battalion until each company shall have not less than 150 men. In case there are not enough voluntary enlistments the governor shall call the unorganized militia into the service until enough men are secured to complete the organization.

SEC. 54. As vacancies may occur in any organization in the service of the United States from death, desertion, or any other cause men shall be at once transferred from the reserve battalion to the organization in the field so that the latter shall at all times have the number of men required by law.

SEC. 56. In time of war, when by reason of failure of volunteer enlistments, the reserve battalion does not have the number of men required by law, the necessary number of men shall be secured in a similar manner as that provided or as may be provided by the laws of the United States.

I drafted this amendment and submitted it to the members of the Committee on Military Affairs, with a letter which states its purpose. The letter is as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, March 14, 1916.

Hon. JAMES HAY,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: I have carefully read the Hay bill to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment and find that no provision is made for the organization of reserves for the National Guard when it is in Federal service. I have therefore introduced the inclosed bill in the hope that it may be used as the basis for a new section in H. R. 12766.

This legislation will accomplish four things:

First, it will keep the National Guard regiments in the field at full war strength; second, it will avoid the organization of new regiments of raw volunteers (this evil practice during the Civil War accounts for a large number of pensioners now on the rolls); third, it will provide for a reserve force that can be used to immediately reenforce the first line in case of an emergency and can also be used to quell local disturbances or to guard strategic points; fourth, it provides an organization to care for invalid soldiers sent back from the firing line until returned to duty or discharged.

You will note that the adoption of this plan will cause no expense to be incurred except in time of war.

Yours, very truly, CARL HAYDEN.

The establishment of depot battalions is a simple device for raising and supporting armies which has been adopted by all civilized countries. It encourages enlistments, because the recruit can be told that in the service he will be among his own friends and neighbors. Under our present method of recruiting for the Regular Army the enlisted man does not know in what organization he may be ordered to serve.

If any of the Members of the House are not familiar with the evils that follow from unwise military legislation, I hope that they will read this volume by Gen. Emory Upton, entitled "The Military Policy of the United States." Go to the document room and ask for Senate Document No. 494, Sixty-second Congress, second session. I have found it more interesting than any novel.

Chapter 18, on "The depletion of armies," sets forth the conclusions reached by Gen. Upton as the results of his experience in the Civil War. Permit me to read a few brief extracts. After outlining the German system of regimental depots, he says:

When war is declared each regiment designates a battalion to serve as a regimental depot. It consists of 22 officers, and may be recruited as high as 1,208 noncommissioned officers and men. The three battalions in the field, the depot battalion, the cadre of the Landwehr battalion, and company districts, all form part of one and the same regiment. Whenever a regiment loses 10 per cent of its men from battle or disease the colonel does not apply for recruits to the adjutant general at Berlin, but sends an order direct to the commander of the depot battalion to forward at once the number required. No man, after having once been enrolled in the army for active service, can skulk away and return to his home. The regulations require that all men in the reserve, the Landwehr, Ersatz reserve, or on furlough shall, on returning to their company districts, report in person to the sergeant major. The Government thus knows where every soldier is who owes military service. If one deserts and does not return to his home, he can not long remain undiscovered by the many officers and men who are undergoing military training in the districts where he may seek refuge.

After quoting the various plans that were adopted during the Civil War to take the place of regimental depots, all of which were miserable failures, Upton gives the following conclusions:

The old regiments, now ably commanded, were left to become skeletons, while under the patronage of the governors a new army sprang into existence, nearly all of whose officers were as destitute of skill and training as those who led the raw troops at Bull Run.

There being at the time more than 600 regiments in the field belonging to the Army of 1861, it would have been possible, had the word "depot" again been suggested to the Secretary of War, to have established at least two regimental depots in each congressional district.

Within each of these small territories there would have been 24 or more officers and noncommissioned officers in sympathy with the community, proud of their regiments, and subject to the direct orders of the Government, who would always have been on the alert to enlist recruits and to bring deserters to justice.

Had this system been adopted the waiting rooms of the governors would no longer have been filled with absentees asking for transportation to the office of a quartermaster in some distant city; the sick soldier and emaciated prisoner of war, carried by their parents or relations to these regimental depots, would at once have been among comrades and friends. The depots would have been so many centers toward which would have converged recruits, sick and wounded convalescents, absentees, and deserters, who, as soon as their numbers became sufficiently large, would have been conducted by intelligent officers or noncommissioned offiers to their regiments in the field.

CAMPS OF INSTRUCTION.

Besides the advantages already referred to, regimental depots, had they been adopted, could have rendered another service equally important. They would have been the natural places for arming and equipping the recruits and for instructing them in all the details of the school of the soldier.

Under a depot system individual instruction, the real object of the camp, could easily have been secured without raising the cry that large commands were lying idle. The regimental depots would have exceeded 600; by recruiting and maintaining them at the small figure of 100 men each, there would have been available in the different States a trained reserve of no less than 60,000 men.

I also desire to read an extract from a recent book, entitled "The American Army," by Gen. William H. Carter, an able officer, who, by the way, was awarded the congressional medal of honor for distinguished bravery in action against the Apache Indians at Cibicu Creek, Ariz., in 1881:

A depot system for passing trained men into the ranks of organizations employed in active campaign is absolutely essential to an economical and efficient conduct of war. Our wars have all been excessively expensive, due to the neglect of this most important feature of military organization. During the Civil War the killed represented only a small fraction of the losses in the average regiment. Sickness, with long periods of convalescence, desertions, and reported missing constituted together an appalling total. The large regiments that went to the front shrunk rapidly in numbers, and although the reduced organizations represented the survival of the fittest and grew daily more valuable with experience of camp, march, and battle, it was only a question of time when by mere attrition many of them ceased to be regiments except in name. Regiments which had entered the service with a thousand or more strong soon fell to half that number. In the meantime the number of officers and noncommissioned officers remained constant, so that the real loss fell upon the bone and sinew of the fighting force—the privates.

Gen. Carter then speaks of the sections of the conscript act which provided that whenever a regiment of Volunteers should become reduced to one-half the maximum strength prescribed by law the President was authorized to direct the consolidation of the companies of such a regiment. Gen. Sherman protested against the orders issued under authority of this act in a letter to his brother, then a Senator from Ohio, which I shall now read:

CAMP BEFORE VICKSBURG, April 23, 1863.

DEAR BROTHER: I have noticed in the conscript act the clauses which empowered the President to consolidate the 10 companies of a regiment into 5 when the aggregate was below one-half the maximum standard, and to reduce the officers accordingly. Had I dreamed that this was going to be made universal I should have written you and begged you for the love of our ruined country to implore Lincoln to spare us this last fatal blow. Two years of costly war have enabled the North to realize the fact that by organized and disciplined armies alone can she hope to restore the old and found a new empire. We had succeeded in making the skeletons of armies, eliminating out of the crude materials that first came forth the worthless material, and had just begun to have some good young colonels, captains, sergeants, and corporals. And Congress had passed the conscript bill, which would have enabled the President to fill up these skeleton regiments full of privates who soon, from their fellows and with experienced officers, would make an army capable of marching and being handled and directed; but, to my amazement, comes this order. This is a far worse defeat than Manassas.

Mr. Wade, in his report to condemn McClellan, gave a positive assurance to the Army that henceforth, instead of fighting with diminishing ranks, we should feel assured that the gaps made by the bullet, by disease, desertion, etc., would be promptly filled, whereas only such parts of the conscript law as tend to weaken us are enforced, viz: Five per cent for furlough and 50 per cent of officers and noncommissioned officers discharged to consolidate regiments. Even Blair is amazed at this. He protests the order can not be executed, and we should appeal to Mr. Lincoln, whom he still insists has no desire to destroy the Army. But the order is positive and I don't see how we can hesitate. Grant started to-day down to Carthage, and I have written to him, which may stave it off for a few days, but I tremble at the loss of so many young and good officers who have been hard at work for two years, and now that they begin to see how to take care of soldiers, must be turned out * * *.

If not too late, do, for mercy's sake, exhaust your influence to stop this consolidation of regiments. Fill all the regiments with conscripts, and if the Army is then too large disband the regiments that prefer to serve north of the Potomac and the Ohio. Keep the war South at all hazards. If this consolidation law is literally enforced, and no new draft is made, this campaign is over. And the outside world will have a perfect right to say our Government is afraid of its own people.

Affectionately, yours, W. T. SHERMAN.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, let me sum up the advantages of the establishment of regimental depot battalions. It will be a function of the reserve battalion to collect, drill, and organize recruits which can be sent to the front, so that each regiment in the field will be kept with a full complement of officers and men, thus avoiding the necessity for organizing new regiments of raw volunteers. Convalescents, stragglers, absentees, and deserters will likewise be collected and sent to their proper organizations. The sick and wounded returned from the front will be cared for by their friends and comrades, and, last but not least, there will always be a reserve force in the several States for use in case of a sudden emergency. By adopting this amendment we will avoid the difficulties under which the Army and the country suffered during the Civil War. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I was in hope that the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] would have had time to emphasize one feature of the amendment which he has proposed, which he but lightly touched upon. One of the pleasures of my life has been to study the actions of the Civil War and to follow the courses of the respective organizations furnished by the States through the war as best I could. That study has revealed nothing so strikingly to me as the weakening of the various units after they had been upon the field of action for a period of time and the fact that there was no adequate method in force at that time for keeping these organizations up to an efficient fighting strength. The words of Gen. Sherman, used in the letter which the gentleman from Arizona has just read, should be written somewhere, so that American youth should know them by heart. Organizations were sent from the States a thousand, twelve hundred strong, and within six or seven months of the time they got upon the field they were down to 600, 700, and then dwindled down to 300, 200; and I am told that in 1864 throughout the Confederate armies there was not a brigade that was as large as a single regiment was in 1861. Furthermore, in the Northern Army the situation was almost as bad. The only thing they could do was to consolidate these units. They put organizations together that did not have a common understanding, a common history, did not understand their officers, resulting in duplication of officers, elimination of officers, general disintegration, and military inefficiency. This plan that is proposed will do this above all things, it will keep your regiment in the field up to its accustomed fighting strength. If it is down to 200 or 100 or even 800, it is not a unit that is to be given full strength and faith of a unit, and I can see no way in which our Army can be secured in its efficiency in time of stress better than by adopting some such amendment as this.

Another thing that the gentleman ought to have emphasized is this. In the days of the Civil War the recruits, as we know, were drilled at the recruiting office to a considerable extent and then sent to the field to join their respective organizations. No two of them were trained alike, no two had the same amount of training, no two of them had the same military efficiency when they reached their unit. This battalion is a drilling, training organization, and the men who become members of it will be trained until they become efficient, and when efficient they will be sent to keep in its highest efficiency these integral units that are on the field of action.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 44. That the enlisted strength of all organizations of the National Guard brought into the military service of the United States shall be maintained as near the maximum authorized war strength provided for the organizations of the Regular Army as possible. That the National Militia Board created by section 20 of the act of May 27, 1908, shall, from the date of the approval of this act, be abolished. The Militia Division now existing in the War Department shall hereafter be known as the Militia Bureau of said department, shall, like other bureaus of said department, be under the immediate supervision of the Secretary of War, and shall not form a part of any other bureau, office, or other organization, but the Chief of the Militia Bureau shall be ex officio a member of the General Staff Corps: Provided, That the President may, in his discretion, assign to duty in the Militia Bureau as assistants to the chief thereof not to exceed one colonel, one lieutenant colonel, and one major of the National Guard, and any such officer while so assigned shall, subject to such regulations as the President may prescribe, receive out of the whole fund appropriated for the support of the militia the pay and allowances of a Regular Army officer having the same rank and length of service as said National Guard officer, whose prior service in the Organized Militia shall be counted in ascertaining his rights under this proviso.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee the purpose in authorizing a detail of State officers of the National Guard for duty in this bureau of militia. As at present organized—and I have some acquaintance with it by reason of my service on the Committee on Appropriations—there are no such officers detailed.

Mr. HAY. The purpose of it is to have somebody in the War Department who is in touch with the National Guard organizations and who knows something about the needs and the requirements of those organizations.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think that the bureau as now organized would be able to get in touch and keep informed as to the conditions?

Mr. HAY. The bureau as at present organized is composed of Regular Army officers.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am aware of that.

Mr. HAY. And of course they are not acquainted as well as the National Guard officers are with the requirements and needs of the National Guard.

Mr. STAFFORD. The idea came to my mind that they could obtain that information, and certainly the chief, as he testified before our committee, showed proficiency and also acquaintance with the National Guard.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman will understand that the point of view of the Regular Army officer is entirely different from the point of view of the National Guard officer, and the purpose of this is to get in closer touch with the National Guard, so that the War Department may be better advised of the reasons for this, that, and the other.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Testimony before the committee was to the effect that in the judgment of the National Guard officers they did not receive the sympathy or the encouragement that they thought their organizations ought to receive, and this provision was put into the bill so that somebody who knew a great deal about the National Guard organizations and who had sympathy for these organizations, who could give encouragement to these organizations, would be there as assistant to the chief of division.

Mr. STAFFORD. In reply I would say that the present chief of this bureau seems to be in entire accord and sympathetic relation with the militia.

Mr. CANNON. But he might die.

Mr. STAFFORD. And he asked for an increased clerical force for the very reason of the new duties that would be imposed upon the bureau by the passage of some such bill as this.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by striking out all after the word "Provided," in line 15, and by inserting in lieu thereof the following: "That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint an additional section of the General Staff, to be composed of five officers of the National Guard with not less than fifteen years' service, at least two of whom shall be officers of the line, said section to be known as the 'National Guard section of the General Staff.' Such officers shall be appointed as follows: One for a term of one year; one for a term of two years; one for a term of three years; one for a term of four years; and one for a period of five years, and thereafter each member of the section shall be appointed for a term of five years. In the event of a vacancy in this section the appointment shall be made for the unexpired term. The members of the National Guard section of the General Staff shall be so selected as to secure, as far as possible, practical and equitable representation to all sections of the United States. No officer shall be eligible to reappointment as a member of the National Guard section of the General Staff within two years after the cessation of his membership under a prior appointment: Provided further, That the National Guard section of the General Staff shall have a suitable office at the War Department, and during their detail the members thereof shall receive the pay and allowance of officers of similar grades in the Regular Army. The members of the National Guard section of the General Staff shall be subject to the orders of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff for consulation respecting the condition, status, and needs of the whole body of the National Guard; and it shall be the duty of such section to recommend to the Secretary of War policies for the benefit and improvement of the National Guard and to confer with him and make recommendations upon all regulations proposed by him for the government of the National Guard: Provided further, That the actual and necessary office expenses, expenses of travel, pay, and allowances for the members of the National Guard section of the General Staff shall constitute a charge against the whole sum annually appropriated for carrying out the provisions of this act."

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, it is no secret that I opposed with all my might in the committee the appointment of any National Guard officers to the Bureau of Militia Affairs. As this provision is written in the bill it will simply mean three fat jobs for three National Guard officers to be brought here to Washington with the rank of major, lieutenant colonel, and colonel, with the salaries that those grades call for, to become clerks in the Bureau of Militia Affairs. So far as representing the National Guard sentiment is concerned, after a few years of separation from their home States they will not represent that sentiment at all. If we are going to have anything of this kind at all, if we are going to have representation of the National Guard in the War Department at all, it seems to me that the place for it is on the General Staff, where the military policies of the country are determined instead of adding three very high-priced clerks of doubtful efficiency to the Bureau of Militia Affairs.

I am willing, if my amendment should strike the committee favorably, to cut it down to three officers instead of five. The grades are not prescribed in my amendment, so you need not make them majors, lieutenant colonels, or colonels, but they may be lieutenants or captains if the President so decides. At any rate, Mr. Chairman, by my amendment they will be on the General Staff, where they should be if we are going to have them at all. Under it they hold office for only a term of years, and go out instead of becoming permanent fixtures.

Mr. TAGGART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TAGGART. Referring to another section of the bill, with whom will the War Department communicate; who will keep the records of the militia of the State; who will transact the business under the bill, leaving out the adjutants general in each State?

Mr. TILSON. I will say to the gentleman that was not left out by my direction, and I do not believe I am able to explain it; so the gentleman should ask the chairman of the committee to explain.

Mr. TAGGART. What does the militia bureau do in connection with the officers of the National Guard?

Mr. TILSON. I understand that, so far as the three provided for in this bill are concerned, they would simply become clerks in the bureau of militia affairs.

Mr. TAGGART. Well, now, suppose the most important thing that could be done was done, and an order was issued from the War Department to the National Guard of the gentleman's State, who would that order reach and who would communicate the order to the various organizations? Who would have all the information as to where they were, in order to do the business?

Mr. TILSON. I do not think that is provided for in this section of the bill at all.

Mr. TAGGART. Well, no such personage as the governor is mentioned in the bill?

Mr. TILSON. He is mentioned several times.

Mr. TAGGART. I mean he is not clothed with any new authority, and I do not know how we could prescribe new duties for a governor.

Mr. TILSON. What the gentleman is saying is not justified as a criticism of my amendment.

Mr. TAGGART. I am not criticizing the gentleman's amendment, I think his amendment is right; but we are providing now for a bureau of officers to transact the business of the National Guard in the War Department, and if they had to transact any business with the National Guard in somebody's State, it might be advisable to inquire with whom they would communicate.

Mr. TILSON. I think the gentleman's inquiry is pertinent, but I desire to say, in closing, in reference to this particular amendment, that if we are going to have anything at all let us have something that will be of a real help to the National Guard. Let us have a body of young officers who will be constantly changing, one at a time, bringing in fresh blood from the National Guard, instead of having three high ranking officers who will outrank three-fourths of the officers now in the Bureau of Militia Affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one minute in order to answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman's amendment is good enough to pass, I should be glad to offer an amendment to cut it down from 15 years to 6, so that we might get genuine new blood.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, it was my intention to ask to modify my amendment and cut it down to five years.

Mr. CANNON. That is all right.

Mr. TILSON. And if it will satisfy the House I will cut it down to three officers instead of five. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may change the 15 years' service to 5 years' service.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TILSON. And cut the number of officers from five to three.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, all this goes to show how impossible it is to perfect a large proposition like this on the floor of the House. This proposition never was before the committee at all. I confess I do not know exactly what it does except in a very general way, and it seems to me dangerous to legislate in this way, and I hope the House will not adopt the amendment, and in the event hereafter it is necessary to do something of this sort we will try and take care of it in conference, or when the bill comes back from the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. TILSON), there were—ayes 24, noes 70.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 54. That each company, troop, battery, and detachment in the National Guard shall assemble for drill and instruction at company, battalion, or regimental armories or rendezvous or for indoor or outdoor target practice not less than forty-eight times each year. And that the President may call into the service of the United States the National Guard or or any part thereof to participate in encampments, maneuvers, or other exercises, including outdoor target practice and field or coast defense instruction, for at least 15 days each year, 5 of which may be in rifle practice, in addition to the assemblies for drill and indoor and outdoor target practice hereinbefore prescribed, unless such company, troop, battery, or detachment shall have been in active service for at least five consecutive days during such year, and he shall have power to call said National Guard or any part thereof into the service of the United States in connection with units of the Regular Army for the purposes aforesaid: Provided, That credit for an assembly for drill or for indoor or outdoor target practice shall not be given unless the number of officers and enlisted men present for duty at such assembly shall equal or exceed a minimum to be prescribed by the Secretary of War, nor unless the period of actual military duty and instruction participated in by each officer and enlisted man at each such assembly at which he is credited as having been present shall be of at least one and one-half hours' duration.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 64, line 1, after the word "prescribed," strike out the sentence down to and including the word "year," in line 4.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, this is done for the reason that if that language is left in the bill and the National Guard should be called out for duty and serve 5 days they would not then have to perform 15 days' service, required by the bill, and for that reason it is proposed to amend the bill.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of convincing everybody, perhaps, who is familiar with this bill that I do not know much about many of its features. Here is a National Guard provided for which—referring to a preceding section or two—the United States has to do much furnishing. I would like to know, if I can in a few words, not to take much time, what are the States to do; what proportion of the expenditure for the National Guard do the respective States have to bear? If they fail to bear the expenses provided for, what is the penalty? In the hasty reading of the bill I have not ascertained that.

Mr. HAY. Does the gentleman wish me to answer?

Mr. CANNON. I shall be glad to know.

Mr. HAY. I will state to the gentleman that under the law now the State is not required to expend anything on the Organized Militia of the State. Each legislature expends what it pleases. Some States spend more than others. For example, the State of the gentleman spends a great deal on its guard. Some other States spend but very little. There is nothing obligatory, so far as the National Government is concerned, upon the States to spend anything, and we have no power to compel, as the gentleman will readily understand, a State to make an appropriation for its National Guard. But they have been for years past making appropriations. For instance, in some of the State constitutions are provisions by which a certain portion of the taxes which are collected are set aside for military purposes. I know that is a provision in the constitution of my own State. In others the constitution makes no provision at all, but the legislature every year appropriates for the National Guard.

The Government of the United States does not at all and has not heretofore required anything from the States. Under the Dick law, and the law passed in 1908 amending that law, the Government of the United States has been contributing to the States $4,000,000 annually for equipment and for training purposes, and every year under the Army appropriation bill there is carried an appropriation for maneuvers.

Mr. CANNON. In other words, as I understand it, while Congress might make conditions under which it should contribute, it has not done so, and practically the only way to regulate it, if this law is enacted, or under existing law, is for Congress to regulate it by the amount it shall appropriate, and if it falls short of meeting the views of the respective States, or any of them, as to being sufficient, the legislature is at liberty to use its discretion to increase the amount from the State treasury?

Mr. HAY. If it chooses; yes.

Mr. MADDEN. May I ask a question there? Under one of the provisions of this bill would not the Government of the United States be required to pay so much for each man who takes a certain amount of drill, for example?

Mr. HAY. Yes; of course. But that is under this law and not under any previous law. Under this law we are for the first time providing for pay for the National Guard, and no State which does not carry out the provisions of this law will be allowed to share in the appropriation made under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. So, as a matter of fact, we are obligated, if this law becomes effective, to pay so much per man per year to those who comply with the provisions of the law?

Mr. HAY. Yes. I thought the gentleman was asking me about the obligations of the State.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. According to the hearings, on page 899, Volume II, the Chief of the Militia Division testified that the States in the year 1914 appropriated $7,729,673.13, whereas the Federal Government appropriated $3,858,383.16, for the support of the National Guard. So the States appropriated more than twice as much as the Federal Government appropriated.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] has just handed me a letter which he received from Gen. Mills, Chief of the Division of Militia Affairs, in the early part of January last, which gives more recent figures as to the expenditures for the militia made by the States of the Union. The letter is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
DIVISION OF MILITIA AFFAIRS,
Washington, January 6, 1916.

Hon. A. P. GARDNER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: Referring to your letter of January 4, 1916, in which you request information as to State disbursements for the support of the militia, and information as to how such sums are raised, I beg to reply as follows:

1. The estimated aggregate disbursement of all States of the Union for the support of the militia for the last fiscal year was $8,463,044.89. This estimate is based upon detailed reports received from all States; the States found it impracticable in most cases to estimate the sums derived by organizations from membership dues, local entertainments, riding academy annexes, and the like. All such sums, impracticable to estimate, were disbursed locally for the support of the militia, and the aggregate reported disbursement, given above, is therefore less than that actually expended by a considerable amount.

2. The aggregate sum reported above is derived from State appropriations and appropriations from municipalities. The sum also includes such amounts as the States could ascertain and report as derived from membership and club dues in organizations, local entertainments, riding academy annexes, and similar local enterprises.

Very truly, yours,

A. L. MILLS,
Brigadier General, General Staff,
Chief Division of Militia Affairs.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit right there?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the House as to how much is likely to be contributed by the National Guard under the scheme carried in this bill?

Mr. KAHN. I think something in the neighborhood of $12,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Suppose the State default in increasing this appropriation? For instance, the State of Kentucky appropriates $10,000——

Mr. KAHN. Kentucky appropriates more. Arkansas appropriates $10,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. What machinery is provided for making up the deficit which would be necessary to maintain a sufficient organization in those States?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, as I told the House on Saturday, that, in my judgment, is one of the serious defects with regard to this particular matter.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does it follow that the National Government may eventually pay everything?

Mr. KAHN. I do not think so. I feel confident that unless the States meet the provisions of this law in the same spirit in which the law has been enacted, unless the States make the necessary appropriations, the best wishes of those who are interested in the development of the National Guard will be defeated. In other words, they will not see their dream realized. That to me is the inherent weakness of this legislation.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of asking the chairman some questions. Under section 54 the President is empowered to call out the State Militia for their summer encampment?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. And if he calls them out at all he must call them out for 15 days' time, including 5 days for target practice; is that correct?

Mr. HAY. It includes that; yes.

Mr. GARDNER. He may not call them out for a lesser period under this section?

Mr. HAY. It says "at least 15 days."

Mr. GARDNER. For instance, he could not call out the State militia for five days or eight days?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Now, then, he may call out the entire militia of a State or he may call out any part of it?

Mr. HAY. That is right.

Mr. GARDNER. Suppose that some State is disinclined or finds difficulty in recruiting soldiers who can give two weeks toward that summer service. The President, then, can not call that State's full quota out at all, can he?

Mr. HAY. Of course he can not call them out if they do not exist. If there are no soldiers, he can not call them out.

Mr. GARDNER. Suppose a State organization is pretty well filled up, like that of my own State of Massachusetts, for example, and suppose that State says to the Secretary of War: "Most of these young men will not be able to serve 15 days. Will the President be good enough not to call us out this year?" That is quite possible, is it not?

Mr. HAY. I do not think so. Anyone who is intrusted with carrying out the provisions of this act and who will act in good faith will not do what the gentleman from Massachusetts thinks they might do.

Mr. GARDNER. I am not so sure of that. It might be done in absolute good faith. You make it optional with the Secretary of War—that is, with the President—whether or not he shall call out these troops for summer encampment. There is no penalty for those who are not summoned to camp, because so long as a militia organization has held 48 drills in a year its members are entitled to pay whether they attend the summer camp or not. Of course any enlisted man must attend 24 drills before he can draw pay.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman is mistaken when he says there is no penalty. This provides for calling them out for service, for training, for at least 15 days.

Mr. GARDNER. Precisely.

Mr. HAY. Now, on page 50, as a part of section 27, it is provided that—

> Whenever any State shall, within a limit of time to be fixed by the President, have failed or refused to comply with or enforce any requirement of this act, or any regulation promulgated thereunder and in aid thereof by the President or the Secretary of War, the National Guard of such State shall be debarred, wholly or in part, as the President may direct, from receiving from the United States any pecuniary or other aid, benefit, or privilege authorized or provided by this act or any other law.

Mr. GARDNER. I do not think the gentleman caught my point. Suppose that the Secretary of War, finding that a Massachusetts regiment is largely composed of men who can not every year sacrifice the time requisite for two weeks in camp, decides not to order that particular regiment out for summer training. You will find, if you read your bill carefully, that, in spite of the fact that the regiment may not have had one day's encampment, nevertheless its members can draw pay for drills in the armory.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more in which to explain the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAY. Under this bill the President is authorized to call these troops out for at least 15 days. Now, of course, the gentleman from Massachusetts or anybody else can imagine any condition which may arise, and he may imagine that the Secretary of War will say that 15 or 20 people in some particular company in the guard of some particular State need not come out. But I do not believe that those conditions are going to arise. If the Secretary of War, whoever he may be, is going to carry out this law in good faith, he is not going to mangle it in that way.

Mr. GARDNER. Does not the gentleman realize that we are right up against that very question next summer? Many men actually in the National Guard at the present moment have enlisted with the idea that they are going to spend only a week next summer in training to be a soldier. Now, next summer, in my opinion the Secretary of War will have a problem to face when the time comes for the summer encampments. Various States are likely to say to him, "Mr. Secretary, we are going to lose a lot of our guardsmen who can not render two weeks' service." Will you not remit that requirement for this year or cut the period down to one week? Under this bill no cut down could be permitted.

Mr. HAY. Now they are not paid. Hereafter they will be paid.

Mr. GARDNER. I think next summer you will find a great falling off in a great many organizations of the National Guardsmen, because of this situation.

Mr. HAY. What remedy would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. GARDNER. I doubt the wisdom of retaining the words "at least." It should be in the power of the Secretary of War, for the present time anyway, to call militia regiments out for a less length of time than 15 days, if in his judgment it is necessary. I think there is some force in this, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HAY. How would it do to strike out the words "at least" and insert the words "not more than," so that it would read, "every year not more than 15 days"?

Mr. GARDNER. I think, as I suggested, that it might be well to put in, as a proviso at the end of that section, this language, "Providing that for the year 1916," and so forth.

Mr. HAY. I will think it over and talk with the gentleman about it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, do I understand that the language in the bill, in the gentleman's opinion, would forbid the President calling these men of the National Guard into national encampments at one time for less than 15 days? The language of the bill provides that the President might call the guard into encampment for at least 15 days in the year.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It is optional with the President and not a requirement?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It provides for 15 days in the year. Does that language mean that if he wishes to call them out for a week at one time he can not do it?

Mr. HAY. I think not. I think he could call them out for a week at one time and for a week at another time.

Mr. MANN. If he can call them out for a week at a time, he can, of course, omit to call them out at another time, or not call them at all.

Mr. HAY. Of course. The assumption was that the President would be anxious to have the National Guard trained at least 15 days in a year, and therefore the committee proposed to provide that they should be called out at least 15 days.

Mr. MANN. As I read that, that was simply an expression of opinion. Is it the intention to give the President the power to call them out for six months?

Mr. HAY. Well, he can do it; yes.

Mr. MANN. He could under the language of this bill. He could call them out, but would they come?

Mr. HAY. They would have to come; that is all. That is just what we are proposing to do.

Mr. MANN. For a summer encampment?

Mr. HAY. We are proposing to suggest, as the gentleman says, that 15 days is a reasonable time for which the National Guard shall be called out to be trained; but if for any reason the President desires them to be called out for longer than that—and I suppose he would require some good reason to be given why he should call them out for a longer time—then he can do it. In other words, we do not want to restrict the power of the President, so that he can not call them out for more than 15 days.

Mr. MANN. Then, I do not see why you do not strike out entirely the words "for at least 15 days each year."

Mr. HAY. Because I think 15 days is a reasonable time, and it is better to put it in the law. It does not make it obligatory for him to call them out for only 15 days.

Mr. MANN. I can not see what it does mean. The President is not required to call them out at all, and he may call them out for 30 days.

Mr. HAY. It means that he must not call them out for less than 15 days.

Mr. MANN. He may not call them out at all.

Mr. HAY. Oh, yes; he has to call them out for at least 15 days.

Mr. MANN. Both gentlemen a moment ago stated that it was optional with the President, and it clearly is, under the terms of the bill.

Mr. HAY. Not at all. The bill says he may, but I will move to insert the word "shall" if the gentleman thinks that will make it any better.

Mr. MANN. I think clearly as it reads here it means that it is optional.

Mr. KAHN. Will the chairman of the committee allow me to make a statement?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. In framing legislation relating to military forces the mandatory expression is never used where the President, who is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, is concerned. We never direct the Commander in Chief of the Army to do anything. We simply authorize him to do it, and therefore in this section we have used the permissive word "may" instead of the mandatory word "shall."

Mr. MANN. And as we can not use mandatory language to the President in regard to his conduct of military affairs, that is very proper. He is the Commander in Chief.

Mr. KAHN. That is it exactly.

Mr. MANN. But it is still optional just the same.

Mr. KAHN. That is true.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield right there?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman does not believe that the President would call them out for drill at all if Congress did not authorize it?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; I fully agree with that.

Mr. GARDNER. But the word "may" is used in connection with the words "for at least 15 days," which is a mandatory provision. That is what is bothering me.

Mr. MANN. That may be.

Mr. GARDNER. It should be either one thing or the other.

Mr. HAY. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that in matters of this sort we want to give some discretion to the Secretary of War, who, after all, would have to handle this proposition, and if we made some obligatory provision which he must obey it might be possible that he would be unable to do it as it ought to be done, and in all matters of this character it has always been the rule to give some discretion, so that under any condition which may arise the Secretary will have the opportunity to meet it and not be trammeled so that he can not meet it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. I just want to make this remark, that as I read this bill it offers an inducement to the States for the formation of a National Guard and offers an inducement to the men in the States to join the guard. If the inducement is sufficient, it may accomplish the purpose of providing military training for a very large number of young men in the country. If the inducement is not sufficient, it will not accomplish the purpose. But it is in no sense obligatory. We do not require that the thing shall be done. We offer to pay something out of the General Treasury if the boys will go in under the provisions that we put in the law; but it is a mere inducement. I hope that it will be sufficient, though I am not at all certain that it will provide—in fact, I am very certain that it will not provide—for the emergency which is now confronting the country.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia wish to make some motion with reference to the section?

Mr. HAY. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 55. That the Secretary of War shall cause an inspection to be made at least once each year by officers of the Regular Army detailed by him for that purpose to ascertain the condition of the property in the hands of the National Guard; whether the National Guard is organized as herein provided for; whether the organization and the officers and enlisted men thereof are sufficiently armed, uniformed, and equipped, and are being properly trained and instructed for active duty in the field or for coast defense; and whether the records of the organization are properly kept in accordance with the requirements of this act and the regulations made thereunder. The reports of such inspections shall serve as the basis for deciding as to the issue to and retention by the National Guard of the military property provided for by this act, or any other property for which accountability is or may be due to the United States. The Secretary of War shall annually report to Congress the condition of the National Guard and what use has been made of the appropriations made therefor.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 10, page 65, add to section 55 the following: "Such reports may grade various organizations as to their efficiency and as to their number compared to the whole militia of the locality, and the Secretary of War, subject to such regulations as the President may prescribe, may, within the limits of appropriation therefor, offer and distribute prizes based on such grades."

Mr. HAY. We will accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 56. That under such regulations as the President may prescribe the Secretary of War is authorized to provide for the participation of the whole or any part of the National Guard in encampments, maneuvers, or other exercises, including outdoor target practice and field and coast-defense instruction, either independently or in conjunction with any part of the Regular Army, and there may be set aside from the funds allotted to any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia for the support of the National Guard such portion of said funds as may be necessary for the payment, subsistence, transportation, and other proper expenses of that portion of the National Guard of said State, Territory, or the District of Columbia that may participate in such encampments, maneuvers, or other exercises, including outdoor target practice and field and coast-defense instruction; and the officers and enlisted men of such National Guard while so engaged shall be entitled to the same pay, subsistence, and transportation as officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades of the Regular Army are or hereafter may be entitled to by law: Provided, That encampments, maneuvers, or other exercises, including outdoor target practice and field and coast-defense instruction, shall be held to include the State and national rifle competitions.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 65, line 12, after the word "prescribe," insert the following: "And within the limits of available appropriations for the support of the National Guard."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 61. That all officers and employees of the United States and of the District of Columbia who are members of the National Guard shall be entitled to leave of absence from their respective duties without loss of pay, time, or efficiency rating on all days engaged in field training ordered or authorized under the provisions of this act.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 68, line 5, after the word "field," insert the words "or coast defense."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"And if such members of the National Guard shall be called into the military service of the United States they shall be granted an indefinite leave of absence from their respective duties up to a date not more than three months after they shall have been mustered out of said military service."

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Chairman, there is no provision made in the act as far as I can see, for employees of the Government who have been away from their post more than a year. During the Spanish War of those sent to the Philippine Islands, many of them who came back failed to get their positions because they said that they had all been filled. It seems to me that the Government, after getting these men to serve with very much loss of pay should provide for their getting their positions back on their return.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment reported again.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. HAY. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to suggest, Mr. Chairman, should not that be a part of section 61 rather than a new section?

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman offered it as a part of the paragraph.

Mr. TILSON. As I understood, the gentleman offered it as a part of the paragraph.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROWE. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman's amendment, of course, contemplates leave of absence from Government employment?

Mr. ROWE. Oh, that is exactly what it says.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, before the question is taken, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] whether he would not insert in this a proviso that an employee of the United States Government could attend the Plattsburg camp without loss of pay?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the people who go to Plattsburg camps are necessarily employees of the Government.

Mr. PLATT. I happen to know of a few cases of employees of the Government who went to the Plattsburg camp last year and who paid all of their own expenses, and had the Government charge them their pay besides.

Mr. HAY. Well, they must have been very independent gentlemen. I think that would be going a little bit too far.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 62. That under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, he may, upon the recommendation of the governor of any State or Territory, or the commanding general of the National Guard of the District of Columbia, authorize any officer or enlisted man of the National Guard to attend and pursue a regular course of study at any military service school or the Army War College, except the Military Academy at West Point, N. Y.; or to be attached to an organization of the same arm, corps, or department, to which the officer or enlisted man belongs, for routine practical instruction at or near an Army post during a period of field training or other outdoor exercises; and such officer or enlisted man shall receive, out of any National Guard allotment of funds available for the purpose, the same travel allowances and quarters or commutation of quarters, and the same pay, allowances, and subsistence to which an officer or enlisted man of the same grade in the Regular Army would be entitled for attending such school, college, or practical course of instruction under orders from proper military authority while in actual attendance at such school, college, or practical course of instruction

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to call the attention of the House to the fact that Mr. J. Clifford R. Foster, chairman of the executive committee of the National Guard Association, is sending out from the Ebbitt Hotel, Washington, D. C., certain bulletins, of which the following, for March 18, 1916, is an example:

BULLETIN TO NATIONAL GUARD ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES.

EBBITT HOTEL,
Washington, D. C., March 18, 1916.

The desire of the President to have the pending military legislation pressed has resulted in such rapid action in both Houses within the last few days that it has been impossible to keep the National Guard as fully advised as to the progress of events as would have been desirable. There has been sent you copy of the Hay bill as it was introduced in Congress. This bill came up for consideration yesterday, and is being debated and amended in the House to-day. I inclose herewith copies of amendments which the executive committee have recommended to the House Military Committee. We are unable to say how many of these will be adopted, but we hope for the adoption of some of the most important.

The Chamberlain bill (S. 4840) was reported yesterday, and will come up for discussion in the Senate on Monday. This bill has been materially changed by the Senate Military Committee. A number of amendments have been suggested by that committee which we regard as very unfavorable to the National Guard. Among the changes is one which would cut all officers out of pay except the captains and lieutenants of companies. We are striving to get amendments adopted which will correct this situation.

We can recommend no specific action at this time except that the Senators from your State be urged to support the amendments to the Chamberlain bill which are proposed by the National Guard Association.

We will keep you advised as fully as possible, and may call upon you by telegraph to bring State influence to bear if the situation shapes up so that this is necessary.

Of course, after these bills have passed the House and Senate we will still have an opportunity to contend for important amendments when they go into the hands of the conference committee.

J. CLIFFORD R. FOSTER,
Chairman Executive Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 74. That section 1661 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the acts of February 12, 1887; June 6, 1900; and June 22, 1906, is hereby amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 1. That a sum of money shall hereafter be annually appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of providing arms, ordnance stores, quartermaster stores, and camp equipage for issue to the National Guard, such appropriation to remain available until expended.

"SEC. 2. The appropriation provided in the last preceding paragraph shall be apportioned among the several States and Territories under just and equitable procedure, to be prescribed by the Secretary of War, and in direct ratio, so far as not in conflict with such procedure, to the annual State and Territorial appropriations existing at the date of apportionment for the support of the National Guard of such States and Territories, respectively, and to the District of Columbia, under such regulations as the President may prescribe: Provided, That the sum so apportioned among the several States, the Territory of Hawaii, and the District of Columbia, shall be available under such rules as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War for the actual and necessary expenses incurred by officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army when traveling on duty in connection with the National Guard; for the transportation of supplies furnished to the militia for the permanent equipment thereof; for office rent and necessary office expenses of officers on duty with the National Guard; for expenses of sergeant instructors on duty with the National Guard, including quarters, fuel, light, medicines, and medical attendance; and such expenses shall constitute a charge against the whole sum annually appropriated under section 1661, Revised Statutes, as amended, and shall be paid therefrom, and not from the allotment duly apportioned to any particular State, Territory, or the District of Columbia; for the promotion of rifle practice, including the acquisition, construction, maintenance, and equipment of shooting galleries and suitable target ranges; for the hiring of horses and draft animals for the use of mounted troops, batteries, and wagons; for forage for the same; and for such other incidental expenses in connection with encampments, maneuvers, and field instruction provided for in sections 14 and 15 of the said act of January 21, 1903, as the Secretary of War may deem necessary: Provided further, That the governor of each State and Territory and the commanding general of the National Guard of the District of Columbia shall appoint, designate, or detail, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, an officer of the National Guard of the State, Territory, or District who shall be regarded as property and disbursing officer of the United States. He shall receipt and annually account for all property belonging to the United States in possession of the National Guard of his State, Territory, or District, and shall make such returns and reports concerning the same as may be required by the Secretary of War. The Secretary of War is authorized, on the requisition of a governor of a State or Territory, or the commanding general of the National Guard of the District of Columbia, to pay to the property and disbursing officer thereof as much of its allotment out of the annual appropriation under section 1661 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, as shall be necessary for the purposes enumerated therein. He shall render his accounts through the War Department to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury for settlement. Before entering upon the performance of his duty as property and disbursing officer, he shall be required to give good and sufficient bond to the United States, in such sums as the Secretary of War may direct, for the faithful performance of his duties and for the safe-keeping and proper disposition of the Federal property and funds intrusted to his care. He shall, after having qualified as property and disbursing officer, receive pay for his services at a rate to be fixed by the Secretary of War, and such compensation shall be a charge against the whole sum annually appropriated under section 1661, Revised Statutes, as amended, and shall not be paid from the allotment duly apportioned to the State, Territory, or District of Columbia. When traveling in the performance of his official duties, under orders issued by the proper authorities, he shall be reimbursed for his actual necessary traveling expenses, the sum to be made a charge against the allotment to the State, Territory, or District of Columbia, under section 1661, Revised Statutes, as amended. The Secretary of War shall cause an inspection of the accounts and records of the property and disbursing officer to be made by an officer of the Army at least once each year. The Secretary of War is empowered to make all rules and regulations necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this section: Provided further, That whenever any property issued to the National Guard of any State or Territory or the District of Columbia as hereinbefore provided has been lost, damaged, or destroyed, or has become unserviceable or unsuitable by use in service or from any other cause, it shall be examined by a disinterested surveying officer detailed by the Secretary of War from the Regular Army, or designated by him from the National Guard, and the report of such surveying officer shall be forwarded to the Secretary of War; and if it shall appear to the Secretary of War, from the records of survey, that the property has been lost, damaged, or destroyed through unavoidable causes, he is hereby authorized to relieve the State or Territory or the District of Columbia from further accountability therefor; if it shall appear that the loss, damage, or destruction of property was due to carelessness or neglect, or that its loss, damage, or destruction could have been avoided by the exercise of reasonable care, the money value thereof shall be charged to the State or Territory or the District of Columbia, to be paid for from the State funds or any funds other than Federal: And provided further, That if the articles so surveyed are found to be unserviceable or unsuitable, from either avoidable or unavoidable causes, the Secretary of War shall direct what disposition, by sale or otherwise, shall be made of such articles, except unserviceable clothing, which shall be destroyed; and if sold, the proceeds of such sale, as well as stoppages against officers and enlisted men, and the net proceeds of collections made from any person or from any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, to reimburse the Government for the loss, damage, or destruction of any property, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as a credit to the State, Territory, or the District of Columbia accountable for said property, and as a part of and in addition to that portion of the allotment of such State, Territory, or the District of Columbia set aside for the purchase of similar supplies, stores, or matériel of war."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 75, line 25, strike out the word "purpose" and after the word "the" insert the words "support of the National Guard, including the expense."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Also, the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 76, line 2, after the word "equipage," insert the words "and all other military supplies."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Also, the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 76, line 2, after the word "Guard," insert as follows: "And such other expenses pertaining to said guard as are now or may hereafter be authorized by law."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, what would be the aggregate expenditure of the National Government for these various supplies?

Mr. HAY. That depends on how much the Military Committee shall determine to appropriate under the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will it not be contingent on the quota of men in the respective units of the National Guard?

Mr. HAY. To a certain extent; yes. I think it is estimated that the pay of the 129,000 will be $11,000,000. I think that can be cut down, however. These supplies you are talking about now have been costing anywhere from two to three million dollars a year.

Mr. STAFFORD. In this change do we purpose to grant further supplies than are provided for under existing law?

Mr. HAY. Yes; I think so. We are proposing to give to the National Guard all of the equipment and supplies we now give to the soldiers in the Regular Army.

Mr. STAFFORD. And also to provide every character of supplies for their use?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Including ammunition?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 76, line 5, strike out the word "paragraph" and insert the word "section."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer another committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 76, in subsection 2 of section 74 of the bill, amend as follows: Strike out all the words in lines 8, 9, and 10 and down to the word "respectively," in line 11, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "to the number of enlisted men in the National Guard in such States and Territories existing at the date of apportionment of said appropriation."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this seems to be a very material change. What is the change and what is the reason for it?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the change is to apply this appropriation to the National Guard in proportion to the men who are enlisted instead of in proportion to the appropriation which may be made by the several States, and the reason for that is to make an efficient National Guard; and therefore we want to apply these appropriations to the entire National Guard of the country and not to any particular State. If States are rich, like New York, under the bill as it is drawn they would get very much the advantage of States which are poor, as they would be able to appropriate large sums for their guard.

Mr. MANN. I do not see how they would get it. You provide how much shall be paid in any event and how it shall be expended.

Mr. HAY. The bill as drawn provides it shall be paid in the ratio of the amount of money which is appropriated by a State.

Mr. MANN. I understand, but you make a fixed obligation on the Government to expend so much money on the National Guard in the different States. That is fixed; we have to meet that. We have a moral obligation to meet that promised by law.

Mr. HAY. But this is for supplies now; we do not deal with the pay, but this deals with supplies.

Mr. MANN. This deals with the whole thing under the amendment which the gentleman has put in.

Mr. HAY. No; this whole section deals with property; it does not deal with pay.

Mr. MANN. What is the first amendment the gentleman put in, for the support——

Mr. HAY. For the support of the National Guard.

Mr. MANN. If that does not cover it, I do not know what it does.

Mr. HAY. If the gentleman will look at the bill he will find an appropriation provided for in the last preceding section——

Mr. MANN. Yes; that is under the same act, the amendatory act.

Mr. HAY. "That a sum of money shall hereafter be annually appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of providing arms, ordnance stores, quartermaster's stores, and camp equipage, and all other military supplies for issue to the National Guard." So that this section applies to stores and not to pay.

Mr. MANN. Of course, I do not know how the appropriation may be made to support the National Guard. I notice under the law now it only refers to supplies. I thought the gentleman had offered an amendment changing that language purposely so as to cover everything under this appropriation.

Mr. HAY. No; the appropriation for pay is provided for further on, by a general section, providing that Congress shall hereafter appropriate annually for the support of the National Guard. Now we have a permanent annual appropriation with which Congress has nothing to do. We do not even know how that is spent.

Mr. MANN. I should think without being certain, of course, that it might be much more expensive in the large cities than it would be in some parts of the country for the maintenance of the National Guard to supply these supplies, and that if the States were willing to bear that expense the Government might contribute its ratable proportion.

Mr. HAY. Well, but that is not the point of this amendment. The point of the amendment is that money shall be distributed to the States in proportion to the number of men who shall enlist, not in proportion to the appropriation which the States shall make. That is the point.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer another committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Page 76, line 20, strike out the word "militia" and insert the words "National Guard."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 77, lines 1 and 2, strike out the words "under section 1661, Revised Statutes, as amended," and insert "for the support of the National Guard."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer another committee amendment.

"And for such other expenses pertaining to the National Guard as are now or may hereafter be authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 78, lines 5, 6, and 7, strike out all after the word "appropriation" in line 5, down to and including the word "amended" in line 7, and after the word "shall" in line 7, insert the words "be available for the support of the National Guard in the judgment of the Secretary of War." And strike out in line 7 the words "the purposes" and insert the words "said purposes"; and in lines 7 and 8 strike out the words "enumerated therein."

Mr. HAY. I will state to the gentleman how it will read in the way I have it amended on line 5, page 78. It will read:

The Secretary of War is authorized, on the requisition of a governor of a State or Territory or the commanding general of the National Guard of the District of Columbia, to pay to the property and disbursing officer thereof as much of its allotment out of the annual appropriation available for the support of the National Guard as shall in the judgment of the Secretary of War be necessary for said purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 78, lines 20 and 21, strike out the words "under section sixteen hundred and sixty-one, Revised Statutes, as amended," and insert the words "for the support of the National Guard."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

Page 79, line 2, after the word "allotment," insert the words "hereinbefore authorized."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment, a committee amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will be recognized. The prior amendment was not agreed to yet.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The amendment that the gentleman offered refers to Territories, which induces me to refer to page 76, lines 13 and 14, wherein, in the apportionment of funds, provision is made for the several States, the Territory of Hawaii, and the District of Columbia. I ask the gentleman from Virginia why Alaska is not included?

Mr. HAY. I offered an amendment to strike out the words "Territory of Hawaii" and insert "Territories."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would include Alaska and meet any question that might arise as to other Territories?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 77, lines 1 and 2, strike out the words "appropriated under section 1661, Revised Statutes, as amended," and insert the words "for the support of the National Guard."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] moves to strike out the last word.

[Mr. SAUNDERS addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. GARDNER. I do so for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Virginia how far he wishes to go to-night? The next section is the pay section, and for that I propose to offer as a substitute the volunteer-army provision contained in the Chamberlain bill.

Mr. HAY. I would like to have the Clerk read through the section, and then the gentleman may offer his substitute, and we will agree on the time; and then I would like also to agree on a time this evening as to section 82 of the bill, which I understand some gentlemen are anxious to discuss, and after that I shall move to rise.

Mr. GARDNER. And have the discussions themselves to-morrow?

Mr. HAY. Yes; to-morrow.

Mr. GARDNER. I am satisfied with that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 75. That certain commissioned officers on the active list belonging to organizations of the National Guard of each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia participating in the apportionment of the annual appropriation provided by section 1661, Revised Statutes, as amended, shall receive compensation for their services, except during periods of service for which they may become lawfully entitled to the same pay as officers of corresponding grades of the Regular Army, as follows, not to include longevity pay, a captain $500 per year and the same pay shall be paid to every officer of higher rank than that of captain, a first lieutenant $240 per year and a second lieutenant $200 per year. Regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War shall determine the amount and character of service that must be rendered by officers to entitle them to the whole or specific parts of the maximum pay hereinbefore authorized: Provided, That all staff officers, aids-de-camp, medical officers, and chaplains shall receive not to exceed one-half of the pay of a captain and captains or majors in command of machine-gun companies, ambulance companies, field hospital companies, or sanitary troops shall receive the pay of a captain of the line.

That each enlisted man on the active list belonging to an organization of the National Guard of a State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, participating in the apportionment of the annual appropriation provided by section 1661, Revised Statutes, as amended, shall receive compensation for his services, except during periods of service for which he may become lawfully entitled to the same pay as an enlisted man of corresponding grade in the Regular Army, at a rate equal to 25 per centum of the initial pay now provided by law for enlisted men of corresponding grades of the Regular Army: Provided, That such enlisted man shall receive the compensation herein provided if he shall have attended not less than 48 regular drills during any one year, and a proportionate amount for attendance upon a lesser number of such drills, not less than 24; and no such enlisted man shall receive any part of said compensation except as authorized by this proviso and the three provisos next following: Provided further, That the compensation provided herein shall be computed for semiannual periods, beginning the 1st day of January and the 1st day of July of each year, in proportion to the number of drills attended; and no compensation shall be paid to any enlisted man for the first semiannual period of any year unless he shall have attended during said period at least 24 drills, but any lesser number of drills attended during said period shall be reckoned with the drills attended during the second semiannual period in computing the compensation, if any, due him for that year: And provided further, That when any man enters into an enlistment other than an immediate reenlistment he shall be entitled to proportional compensation for that year if during the remainder of the year he shall attend a number of drills whose ratio to 20 is not less than the ratio of the part of the year so served to the whole year; and when any man's enlistment shall expire the compensation, if any, to which he may be entitled shall be determined in like manner: And provided further, That periods of any actual military duty equivalent to the drills herein prescribed (except those periods of service for which members of the National Guard may become lawfully entitled to the same pay as officers and enlisted men of the corresponding grades in the Regular Army) may be accepted as service in lieu of such drills when so provided by the Secretary of War.

That all amounts appropriated for the purpose of this section shall be disbursed and accounted for by the officers and agents of the Quartermaster Corps of the Army, and all disbursements under the foregoing provisions of this section shall be made as soon as practicable after the 31st day of December and the 30th day of June of each year upon pay rolls prepared and authenticated in the manner to be prescribed by the Secretary of War: Provided, That stoppages may be made against the compensation payable to any officer or enlisted man hereunder to cover the cost of public property lost or destroyed by and chargeable to such officer or enlisted man.

That, except as otherwise specifically provided herein, no money appropriated under the provisions of this section shall be paid to any person not on the active list, nor to any person over 64 years of age, nor to any person who fails to qualify as to fitness for military service under such regulations as the Secretary of War shall prescribe.

Mr. HAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, have the gentlemen on the other side any objection to my offering two or three amendments in order to perfect the section?

Mr. KAHN. No.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 80, lines 24 and 25, strike out the words "provided by section 1661, of the Revised Statutes, as amended," and insert the words "for the support of the National Guard."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 81, line 14, strike out the word "and" and insert the words "except that."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 81, lines 20 and 21, strike out the words "provided by section 1661, Revised Statutes, as amended," and insert the words "for the support of the National Guard."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, on page 83, line 2, after the word "twenty," I wish to insert the word "four," so that it will read "whose ratio to twenty-four." Evidently that was a mistake.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 83, line 2, after the word "twenty," insert the word "four."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, how much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. GARDNER. On page 80, beginning on line 20, strike out section 75 and insert another section 75, which is section 66 of the Chamberlain bill.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman to have it printed in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD and read in the morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the amendment be printed in the RECORD and read in the morning. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the amendment proposed by Mr. GARDNER:

Strike out section 75 and insert the following:

"SEC. 75. The Volunteer Army. The President is hereby authorized, at any time, to organize, maintain, and train, under the provisions of sections 3 to 12, both inclusive, of an act entitled 'An act to provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war,' approved April 25, 1914, volunteer forces, not exceeding an average of 600 officers and enlisted men for each congressional district. The term of enlistment, which shall in no event be greater than that of the Regular Army, the period of service with the colors and with the reserve, and the period of training shall be as the President may prescribe, those passing to the reserve to have the status and obligations prescribed for reserves of the Regular Army. Officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces raised under the provisions of this section shall be entitled to the pay and allowances of officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades in the Regular Army during periods of training only.

"Temporary appointments and promotions of officers of the Regular Army arising from the operation of this section may be terminated at the discretion of the President.

"Officers of the Regular Army who receive commissions in the volunteer army herein authorized shall in time of peace receive the pay and allowances of their respective grades in the Regular Army, and no more."

Mr. HAY. How much time does the gentleman want for the discussion of this matter?

SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 23, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee for that heaven that is always beyond our grasp, for the beauty and glory of heaven, for its lure and temptation. We thank Thee that following the ideals born of the revelation of God in our souls we are raised day by day to higher and nobler things. Let not the vision of heaven fade from our eyes. Keep us ever reminded of that eternal to-morrow. In the midst of conflicts and hatreds and weaknesses, in the midst of the limitations of life that perplex us, may we remember the fullness of the life that is for those who are finally faithful to the highest ideals of life. Carry us this day upward and nearer to the blessed realization of our hopes in Christ. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CORRECTION—STRUCTURE OF BATTLESHIPS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask leave to make a correction. In speaking on the armor-plate bill I referred to certain defects in the New Hampshire, Vermont, Connecticut, and Kearsarge. I spoke of those as structural defects tending to torsional vibration at the stern. There is a defect, which has become apparent between 12 and 14 knots, but disappears at speeds above. In order that the matter may be correctly stated, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter from Admiral Taylor, Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR,
NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 22, 1916.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In your speech of Monday on the armor-plate factory matter (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 4438), you state:

"There are under repair the New Hampshire, Vermont, Connecticut, and Kearsarge. These four ships have some structural defect, so that if they are pushed to a speed of over 12 knots they have a torsional vibration at the stern which it is feared will crack the shafts. There is some structural defect in them, I am sorry to say, and they will have to be largely rebuilt."

You have evidently been misinformed in connection with the above, and will, I am sure, be glad to learn the facts.

Some vessels of the Connecticut class have been giving trouble by breaking shafts for a number of years. I believe that some five or six years ago two vessels of this class were laid up at the same time with broken shafts. The policy for a long time was to replace the shafts as they broke, but a board appointed last summer has finally solved the mystery and discovered that at certain revolutions corresponding to speeds in the vicinity of 12 knots there are torsional vibrations of the shafts, producing abnormal stresses. This is due to synchronism between the period of revolutions of the engines and the natural period of torsional vibration of the shafts. There is no question of torsional vibration of the ship or any structural defect involving rebuilding even in small part. It has been decided to strengthen the supports of the shafting and, as soon as possible, to replace the present shafts by larger ones.

The trouble culminates at about 12 knots and disappears at higher speeds as soon as the synchronism to which it is due is sufficiently broken by the increased revolutions corresponding to higher speeds. The difficulty with the ships is that the speed at which synchronism occurs is the ordinary cruising speed of the fleet. The trouble does not prevent these ships being pushed to a speed of over 12 knots. These torsional vibrations disappear at speeds above 14 knots or thereabouts.

I am very sorry that you should have been misinformed in this connection. Allegations of structural weakness of ships, even when in error, seem hard to live down, as you may recall in the case of the Dolphin, and certainly as regards the Connecticut class there is absolutely no question of torsional vibrations of the structure or any defect of the structure as a whole.

Very respectfully,
D. W. TAYLOR,
Chief Constructor, United States Navy.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE, United States Senator,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MISSOULA, MONT., March 18, 1916.

Hon. HENRY L. MYERS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your water-power-site bill is right, and absolutely in the interest of the people, in that it proposes to save to them, in the Federal Government, such a vital heritage as water power.

It is, and always will be, easier for Congress than for the legislatures to keep the Jacobs from getting our birthrights from us for a mess of pottage—or for nothing.

Many other matters that are most vital to our national life and domestic peace are before Congress and should be handled with integrity. Tell the Congress that I (we, all) want your bill to become a law, and that I want other fair laws. Read this letter to them, if you will, so that they may heed me (all). We must have integrity.

With kindest regards and highest esteem, I beg to remain,

Very cordially, yours,

FREDERICK D. WHISLER.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions, signed by the honorable speaker of this house and the president of the honorable senate, be at once forwarded to our Representative in Washington, D. C.

R. 6918) to relieve Congress from the adjudication of private claims against the Government, which is now pending in the Committee on the Judiciary. I move that the amendment be printed and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

ADDRESS BY PROF. ROYCE.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I observe that the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], on the 6th instant, quoted a portion of the address by Prof. Royce, of Harvard University. It is very brief, and I think as it was partly quoted the entire address ought to be printed in the RECORD. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DUTIES OF AMERICANS IN THE PRESENT WAR.

[By Josiah Royce, LL. D., professor in Harvard University.]

I fully agree with those who believe that men can reasonably define their rights only in terms of their duties. I have moral rights only in so far as I also have duties. I have a right to my life because it gives me my sole opportunity to do my duty. I have a right to happiness solely because a certain measure of happiness is needed to adapt me to do the work of a man. I have a right to possess some opportunity to fulfill the office of a man; that is, I have a right to get some chance to do my duty. This is, in fact, my sole inalienable right.

This doctrine that rights and duties are correlative is an old teaching. It is also a dry and somewhat abstractly worded bit of wisdom, unwelcome to our more flippant as well as to our more vehement moods, and of late unpopular. I am not here to expound it. I mention it only because I rejoice that we are here to-day to consider what we have deliberately chosen to name the duties of Americans in the present war. I doubt not that we Americans have also our rights in the world crisis through which we are passing. I was glad and eager to sign the recent memorial, addressed to the President of the United States, and issued by the "Committee on American Rights." But I signed that memorial with enthusiasm just because I believe not only that the American rights in question are genuine, but that they correspond with our duties as Americans, and with the duty which our country now owes to mankind. It is of our duties that I now rejoice to speak to you.

Two things have made clear to many of us Americans since the outset of the present war—and to some of us with a constantly increasing definiteness of vision—what our duty is. First, the fact that in this war there is constantly before our eyes the painfully tragic and sublime vision of one nation that, through all its undeserved and seemingly overwhelming agonies, has remained unmistakably true to its duty—that is, to its international duty, to its honor, to its treaties, to the cause, to the freedom, and to the future union of mankind. That nation is Belgium.

In the heart of every true American this consciousness ought therefore to be kept awake—and in many of our minds this consciousness is glowingly and radiantly active and wakeful—the desire, the longing, the resolution: "Let us, let our dear Republic, do our duty as Belgium and the Belgian people have done theirs. Let us, with all our might, with whatever moral influence we possess, with our own honor, with our lives, if necessary, be ready, if ever and whenever the call comes to our people, to sacrifice for mankind as Belgium has sacrificed, to hazard all as Belgium has hazarded all, for the truer union of mankind and for the future of human brotherhood." That vision of Belgium's noble and unsparing self-sacrifice for international honor is one of the two things that to-day constantly remind us of what international duty is, and so what our own American duty is.

The second thing which constantly keeps wide awake in the minds of many of us here in America, the knowledge of what our duty is, is the moral attitude which has been deliberately and openly assumed by Germany since the outset of the war. This attitude gives us what will remain until the end of human history—one great classic example of the rejection, by a great and highly intelligent nation of the first principles of international morality—the rejection of international duty, the assertion that for its own subjects the State is the supreme moral authority and that there is no moral authority on earth which ranks superior to the will of the State.

The assertion has often been made that we Americans have believed the lies of Germany's enemies and have thus been ignorantly and woefully deceived. Countless German attempts have been made to tell us, through books, pictures, newspapers, sometimes through other documents, what Germany's real motives are. I am sure that I speak the minds of many of you, my countrymen and fellow citizens, when I say that, next to the vision of bleeding and devoted Belgium—that suffering servant of the great community of mankind—no picture more convincingly instructs us regarding our duty than the picture that comes before our minds whenever we remember Germany's summons at the gates of Liege or recall von Jagow's answer to one of President Wilson's early Lusitania notes or when, more recently, we read the first Austrian note in answer to President Wilson's peremptory demand about the case of the Ancona.

No; not Germany's enemies, but Germany herself, her prince, her ministers, her submarine commanders, have given us our principal picture of what the militant Germany of the moment is and of what Germany means for the future of international morality. This picture constitutes the second of the two great sources of our instruction about what our American duty in this war is.

We are all accustomed to "look on this picture and then on this." The first of the two pictures is now familiar, inexpressibly sad, and dear to us. Belgians are amongst us as friends or as colleagues; Belgian relief is one of the principal good causes of American charity. Belgian wrongs, but also Belgian heroism and Belgian unswerving dutifulness, are before our eyes as inspiring admonitions of what is the duty of Americans in the present war. That constitutes the one picture. The other—well, Germany has chosen to set before us this second picture. That, in its turn, has now become too familiar. But since our memory for diplomatic notes easily and early begins to fail, that second picture often tends to fade out amongst us. And since we all long for peace to come and since some faint hearts forget that it is as immoral to make light of grave wrongs and merely to condone them as it is irrationally to cry out with lust of vengeance—since these things are so, there are Americans who forget the second picture, and forget that Germany has done as much as Belgium to set before us what our international duty, as individuals and as a Nation, really is.

What that second picture means, what spirit it expresses, what view of the nature of each nation's obligations to mankind it sets before us, we have not been left to learn from the enemies of Germany. The chief ally of Germany, whose submarine policy was "made in Germany," and whose will in this matter is the will of Germany, lately explained the matter to us in unmistakable terms. I refer to the Ancona case. President Wilson accepting not any so-called "lies" of the enemies of Germany, but the official statement of the submarine commander who sank the Ancona after that vessel had ceased to make her effort to escape, and while her passengers were still in danger of drowning in case their vessel was sunk—President Wilson addressed to Austria a note in which he plainly and accurately said that the officially reported act of the submarine commander was in principle barbarous and abhorrent to all civilized nations. Austria in its reply very courteously, ironically, and cynically thanked our Government for the "esteemed favor" of its communication and expressed its entire ignorance of what law, of what principle of international morality, there might be which the submarine commander was supposed by the American Government to have violated.

Now, this Austrian reply, widely praised by the inspired German press as a masterpiece of diplomatic skill and received with "quiet joy" by the official lovers and defenders of the German submarine policy, was precisely in the spirit of Cain's reply when he was challenged from overhead regarding the results of his late unpleasantness with his brother Abel, for Cain, while his brother's blood was crying from the ground, received a somewhat stern diplomatic communication from a moral power, demanding, "Where is thy brother?" And Cain in substance begged to acknowledge the esteemed favor of this communication from on high, and seems at first to have taken a certain stilles Vergnügen in begging to represent first that, so far as he knew, he was not his brother's keeper, while, for the rest, he desired most respectfully, and in the friendliest spirit, to inquire what law of God or man he was supposed to have broken.

Now, this is the spirit of international immorality, this is the sort of enmity to mankind, which the German submarine policy, its official allies and defenders, have expressed and justified. Upon this second picture, then, with its lurid contrast to the picture of Belgium, we have to look when we think of our duty as Americans, for deliberate national deeds can not be undone, nor can their official justifications be lightly condoned by reason of later diplomatic trifling and by reason of speciously well-written notes of apology and withdrawal. The deed stays. Its official justification reveals motives and confesses a national spirit whose moral meaning is as irrevocable as death. We Americans know what the Lusitania outrage meant and to what spirit it gave expression. That spirit has the "primal eldest curse upon it—a brother's murder," for the young men, the women, the babies who went down with the Lusitania were our dead. At least I know—some of whose pupils were amongst the victims of the Lusitania—that they were my dead, and the mark of Cain lasts while Cain lives.

Such facts determine the duty of Americans in this war. Our duty is to be and to remain the outspoken moral opponents of the present German policy and of the German State so long as it holds this present policy and carries on its present war. In the service of mankind we owe an unswerving sympathy not to one or another but to all of the present allied enemies of Germany. We owe to those allies whatever moral support and whatever financial assistance it is in the power of this Nation to give. As to munitions of war, it is not merely a so-called American right that our munition makers should be free to sell their wares to the enemies of Germany, it is our duty to encourage them to do so, since we are not at the moment in a position to serve mankind by more direct and effective means. For the violation of Belgium and the submarine policy of Germany and of her ally, a policy deliberately and boastfully avowed as long as the central powers deemed such avowal advantageous, this violation and this policy together suffice to keep clearly before our eyes the fact that Germany, as at present disposed, is the willful and deliberate enemy of the human race. It is open to any man to be a pro-German who shares this enmity. But with these two pictures before our eyes it is as impossible for any reasonable man to be in his heart and mind neutral as it was for the good cherubs in heaven to remain neutral when they first looked out from their rosy glowing clouds and saw the angels fall.

Neutral, in heart or in mind, the dutiful American, when once he has carefully looked upon this picture and then on this, will not and can not be. He must take sides. And if he takes sides as I do, he will say: "Let us do all that we as Americans can do to express our hearty and, so far as we can, our effective sympathy with the united friends of Belgium, who are the foes of those German enemies of mankind. Whenever the war is over, if it ends in the defeat and consequent moral reform of Germany, then, in due time, let charity have its perfect work. For we in America have long loved and studied German civilization and would be loving it still but for its recent crimes. But now, while the war lasts, and Belgium bleeds, and mankind mourns, let us aid the allied enemies of Germany with sympathy, since the cause of the allied enemies of Germany is the cause of mankind; let us enthusiastically approve of supplying the enemies of Germany with financial aid and with munitions of war; let us resist with all our moral strength and influence those who would place an embargo upon munitions; let us bear patiently and uncomplainingly the transient restrictions of our commerce which the war entails; let us be ashamed of ourselves that we can not even now stand beside Belgium and suffer with her for our duty and for mankind; and while we wait for peace let us do what we can to lift up the hearts that the Germany of to-day has wantonly chosen to wound, to betray, and to make desolate. Let us do what we can to bring about at least a rupture of all diplomatic relations between our own Republic and those foes of mankind, and let us fearlessly await whatever dangers this our duty as Americans may entail upon us, upon our land and upon our posterity. We shall not thus escape suffering, but we shall begin to endure, as Belgium to-day endures, for honor, for duty, for mankind."

ENLISTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, I have here a letter from a constituent in a town in my State, which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

YANKTON, S. DAK., March 23, 1916.

Hon. E. S. JOHNSON, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: If there is a chance for volunteers in this Mexican trouble, I can furnish 100 men, all officered, inside of 24 hours. I wish you would use your influence to get us in, providing they make the call. As ever,

Your humble servant,

C. A. THOMAS,
609 Picolle Street, Yankton, S. Dak.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I did not quite understand the nature of this communication. Who introduced it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota what is the purport of the communication?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. It is a communication in the form of a personal letter, the writer stating that he would raise 100 troops in case they were needed in Mexico.

Mr. PENROSE. The individual whose communication has been read is the gentleman who wants to raise the 100 men?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. If every communication of this kind were read to the Senate, it is needless to say that we would do little or nothing else. I am glad to hear that so much chivalry and gallantry exists in the State of South Dakota.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to make this observation, I should like to say that while not intending in any sense to criticize the course taken by my friend from South Dakota, it seems to me that the introduction of communications of this kind at this time is rather ill advised. The situation in Mexico is, as we know, somewhat acute, and whatever tends to add to the acuteness of that situation I regard as something done that would be better left undone.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit an inquiry? As I understand it, the Government is engaged now in enlisting men, and enlistments are advertised for. This gallant individual, instead of exploiting his name before the Senate of the United States, might perhaps have gone to the nearest enlistment office and enlisted and be in Mexico by this time.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I think the Senator's observation that the sender of the telegram or communication might very well have taken his hundred men to an enlisting office and put them into the Army of the United States without much ado about it——

Mr. PENROSE. He might have gotten too close to the real situation had he done so.

Mr. STONE. There is where my objection comes in. There is a law now passed by the House and the Senate authorizing the enlistment of 20,000 men to make up the deficiency or shortage in the regiments in the service, and that might be done without flaunting before the world the notion that enlistments are made for a particular purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have received a great many letters and telegrams similar to the one that has been presented to the Senate this morning. I felt it to be my duty to refer those letters to the War Department. That is where they belong. I do not think it is wise, as the Senator from Missouri has said, to have them printed in the RECORD and made public. No good can come from it. If the parties writing them are sincere in their desire to enlist, they can take it up with the War Department. I think that ought to be the policy pursued in all such cases.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, I have been out of the Chamber and just returned. Did the Senator from Utah in his remarks refer to the letter I presented?

Mr. SMOOT. I will state to the Senator that I did refer to the letter the Senator offered to the Senate. I will say to the Senator that in the past, whenever there has been an intimation of trouble of our country with any other country, Senators are flooded with similar letters. Many of them come from sincere men; others come from men who have no other desire than to have their names exploited in public. It has been the policy in the past, I will say to the Senator, to discourage the printing of such requests in the RECORD. That is all I had in mind in what I said.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, my only object in presenting the letter was the reason that I personally know the writer. He served our country in the Spanish War. He is a hard-working, industrious, honorable man. He is patriotic to a marked degree. As a new Member of this body, I have observed that many telegrams and resolutions have been read to the Senate, which, to my mind, did not indicate as great a degree of usefulness to this body or to the country as the one which I asked to have read.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me? Why did not this gallant gentleman go to the nearest enlisting office with his hundred warriors and enlist instead of talking about it?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. My answer to the Senator from Pennsylvania is that there is no enlisting office at that place. He only tenders his services as a volunteer in case volunteers are needed by our Government for Mexico.

Mr. PENROSE. They are needed now. The Government is enlisting men, and is very glad to have men of this caliber.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Very well; this gentleman stands ready to answer the call at any time, whenever he is notified to that effect. I will guarantee that. If this point is sustained or the objection raised by the Senator from Pennsylvania or other Senators, I shall ask that the letter be returned to me, and will read it as a part of my remarks.

I also desire to add in this connection that I have sent a copy of the letter to the War Department, and I believe the department will give it due and timely consideration, as it certainly deserves.

Mr. PENROSE. If the enlisting office is at a distant point, I will be one to assist in making up a contribution to carry this gallant gentleman to the nearest point and have him enlist immediately.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I do not think that a citizen who volunteers his services to his country should be subjected to such criticism as that just made by the Senator from Pennsylvania. No doubt this man is a perfectly patriotic and brave American, and because he has sought, through the Senator from his State, to make known his desire to serve his country, to my mind, is no proper reason for such criticism, but, indeed, should be commended.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I wish to say that all of us receive hundreds of letters of this character, and it does seem to me entirely outside of the jurisdiction of the Senate to be exploiting any individual. I suppose during the last two months I have referred to the War Department many hundreds of letters of this character. This thing has occurred before in the Senate, and has generally met with adverse comment. I did not think, therefore, that on this occasion it ought to pass without criticism.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, it is not a matter of exploitation. The Senator from Pennsylvania draws, I have no doubt, upon his very vivid imagination when he suggests that this patriotic citizen of a sovereign State is undertaking to exploit himself simply because he offers his services to his country. I recognize, of course, that the proper procedure would be to refer such matters to the War Department; but because in one single instance that procedure was not followed I do not think it is entirely in consonance with the propriety of matters to subject this man to any sort of criticism because the Senator from his State has laid before the Senate of his country a proffer of his services in its defense.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, if there are objections to this matter going into the RECORD, and those objections shall be sustained, I desire to read the letter and have it go into the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter has been read.

Mr. PENROSE. There is no objection.

Mr. ROBINSON. Regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. MYERS. If the Senator will yield to me, I will suggest to him that if any Senator will rise and say that he is ashamed of the communication, the Senator might withdraw it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Regular order!

SHIPS FOR THE NAVY.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I desire to have placed in the RECORD a concrete statement of the ships authorized and now in process of construction for our Navy. It is true that these data appear in the reports before the Naval Committee and undoubtedly will be made public when the committee reports to the Senate, but I think that this information ought to be placed in a concrete form by itself. For that reason, I ask that it be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I do not object to having the matter inserted in the RECORD, but the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has fully set forth all of the facts therein contained, and they are already in the RECORD.

Mr. CLAPP. That is very true, but here is a concrete statement of one particular phase of the situation, and it does seem to me that the information ought to be in the RECORD by itself.

Mr. PENROSE. Let it go.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further concurrent or other resolutions? If there be none, morning business is closed.

SWISS MILITARY LAW.

Mr. WORKS obtained the floor.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. WORKS. I do.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I desire to occupy just a moment.

Mr. WORKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, last week the Senate authorized the printing of a document containing the Swiss military laws and reports on the efficiency of the Swiss Army. Since then, I have discovered a very beautiful work of art illustrating the effect of Swiss neutrality. It represents Switzerland, fully armed, protecting innocence—women and children—from the ravages and the demons of war. I now ask unanimous consent to have this illustration made a one-page addition to the document which has heretofore been ordered printed, if it can be done.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland if he has in his hand the photographic illustration to which he refers?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Yes; but, of course, it will have to be reduced in size.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that perhaps in the reduction in size the print may not be so perfect as the sample submitted. If it should not be, I suppose the Senator would not care about having it reproduced?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I have had a consultation in reference to that matter, and, if the reproduction is not successful, of course we should not care to have it made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maryland? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WORKS. I do.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to inquire as to the parliamentary situation of the joint resolution introduced yesterday by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. Does that joint resolution come up as a matter of morning business, or must it be taken up on a vote?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present occupant of the chair has a number of times decided that such resolutions do not come up automatically.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Illinois, if the Senator from California will permit me, if he intends to call up his joint resolution to-day?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Iowa that I intend to do so at the first available moment, when I can obtain recognition, and I shall do so under a sense of responsibility which I myself do not intend officially longer to carry in this Chamber.

Mr. KENYON. I am very glad the Senator from Illinois is going to do that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It will require a majority vote of the Senate to take up the joint resolution. We shall insist upon that when the motion is made.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I have the floor, but I am perfectly willing to yield briefly.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if I may raise the point of order, I wish to inquire would not the resolution of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], if called up, be morning business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present occupant of the chair has a number of times decided that the rules of the Senate provide what shall be the regular order of business during the morning hour. In those rules there is no statement that resolutions coming over from a preceding day shall be laid before the Senate by the Chair. At the last session of Congress, and twice at this session, the Chair has announced to the Senate that, as there is nothing in the rules which requires the Chair to lay such resolutions before the Senate, they must be called up by the Senator desiring to have them laid before the Senate, and the Senator has a right to do so before the conclusion of morning business.

Mr. LODGE. I recognize entirely what the ruling and practice of the Chair has been; but my question was whether, if the resolution were called up, in accordance with the ruling of the Chair, it would not then be morning business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It certainly would be.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Missouri will permit, the Chair desires to answer further the Senator from Massachusetts. The Senator from Illinois on yesterday did not ask that the resolution go over under the rule. The Senator from Illinois, as the RECORD shows, introduced it and asked that it lie on the table.

Mr. LODGE. That is a different thing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is an entirely different question than the one submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have not looked this morning, or lately, at the rule that would govern the case, but since the question has been raised it occurs to me to ask the Chair, as a parliamentary question, what the real difference is between a bill and a joint resolution, and why a joint resolution, when offered, does not follow the course of a bill when offered? To become effective a joint resolution must pass both Houses and be signed by the President.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in this case, if the Senator will allow me, the Senator from Illinois asked that the resolution lie on the table, which is very often done in the case of bills and joint resolutions.

Mr. STONE. The same thing is true as to bills.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; both as to bills and joint resolutions. Senators frequently introduce them and ask that they lie on the table until they are called up, with the object of the Senator addressing himself to the subject of the bill or joint resolution. Under the rules, a joint resolution, of course, like a bill, must have two readings and go to a committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And it is not before the Senate until it is reported out of committee, unless the Senate gives some other direction.

Mr. LODGE. Anything is before the Senate for debate that the Senate chooses to debate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I say, unless the Senate gives it that direction. It is not a matter of right to call up a joint resolution.

Mr. LODGE. I have frequently heard in the Senate many subjects debated that were not strictly before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Unquestionably; but I am referring to the matter of right.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I will not ask a ruling on the parliamentary inquiry, since the matter is not now before the Senate. I merely sought to suggest the matter to the Chair and to the Senate by the question, having in mind the time when this particular joint resolution might be called up. I hold that it can not be called up, for general discussion at least.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California will proceed.

PREPAREDNESS FOR PEACE.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, this debate on preparedness for war has proceeded, so far, upon the theory that the one and only means of defense against attack is men with arms in their hands, ships of war bristling with death-dealing guns, submarines provided with missiles of death and destruction, huge military fortifications, and all the machinery and paraphernalia devised to kill and maim our fellow men. We seem to have forgotten, for the time, that the best means of defense against attack upon the individual man or a nation are honesty, justice, unselfishness, and love of all mankind; that the sure way to preserve our honor is to be honorable; that to maintain our rights we must respect the rights of others; that to bring about universal peace we must be ourselves peaceable and peace loving; that to be respected by other nations we are bound to entitle ourselves to respect.

In a very interesting article in the Round Table, an English publication, it is well said:

> The stability of a commonwealth rests upon the honesty, fair play, and sense of public responsibility of its own citizens and on nothing else. The principle of its life is the Christian spirit of devotion to duty and the active service of the rest of the community. Where that fails, and self-seeking takes its place, the commonwealth itself will also fail.

This Nation has lost that calm poise that should characterize a just and righteous nation. We have forgotten the injunction be not afraid. We seem not to remember the saying of one of the beatitudes, "Blessed are the peacemakers for they shall be called the children of God." Through the machinations, the insinuations, the misrepresentations of designing men and women, the whole Nation is trembling with fear and apprehension. Even the President of the United States has fallen under the spell and has been carrying about the country this gospel of fear. Civic bodies all over the country, bodies that had much better devote themselves to the purposes for which they were organized, influenced and incited by selfish interests that flourish and grow rich on large standing armies and great naval armaments, have made themselves messengers of fear and misrepresentation.

Some of the influences that have been instrumental in bringing about this war scare with its inspired demand for military preparedness are transparently obvious. They are the military and naval organizations seeking to increase the power and prestige of their arm of the Government; the manufacturers of war munitions, who are looking for more continued and permanent profits for themselves; and politicians, who expect the movement to continue them in power or if they are out of power to restore them again to place. We know where to look for these influences. Observing people are able to discount them.

But, Mr. President, there is a more insidious and dangerous influence behind the ones I have mentioned that is not so open, not so readily detected, which is more far-reaching and powerful than all the other influences combined. It is the influence of plutocracy, wealth, big business that already wields such immense and such a selfish control over the destinies of this country. Plutocracy and militarism are concordant and congenial evils. The one leads naturally to the other and fosters and sustains it. They are both dangerous enemies to free and popular government. Big business sees before it when the European war comes to an end complications and business and financial war, with prospective loss of supremacy that has come to it through the misfortunes of the warring nations. The great corporations and financiers of the country and men engaged in foreign trade and commerce want a strong Army and Navy in their own interests. They are the real powers behind this preparedness movement. It is their money, I believe, that is subsidizing newspapers and magazines and financing the campaign of fear that has set the Nation wild with apprehension of a danger that exists only in imagination. Plutocracy, the combination of enormous wealth in the hands of the few, leads to militarism, and militarism, when established, will perpetuate and increase the money power that even now threatens the perpetuity of our free institutions.

What this country needs to-day is not protection from foreign nations but defense against the aggressive influences of the power of money in the hands of a selfish and grasping few of its own citizens. The dangers that threaten us are within and not without, and that danger will be enormously increased by the establishment of a great military force.

This is not to say that we should not maintain our Army and Navy on a reasonable and efficient peace footing. There is no present necessity for any considerable increase of our standing Army, if any. What we need first of all is to make the Army more efficient and the position of a private soldier more respectable and respected. This can best be done by enlisting worthy young men and not criminals and derelicts, as is very generally done now, paying them decent wages, and treating them as respectable American citizens should be treated in every walk of life. We do not pay our soldiers enough, and they are treated more like serfs or slaves than citizens of a free Republic under a Constitution declaring all men to be free and equal. Our Army needs to be rejuvenated, regenerated, and placed on a respectable footing.

I am not proposing now to deal with the Mexican situation. It is a thing apart from the problems growing out of the war in Europe that are confronting us as a Nation. Our relations with that unhappy country, and the obligations resting upon this Nation, growing out of them, are so entirely different from those flowing from war conditions in Europe that what I might say about one of them could have but little bearing on the other. That our soldiers now on Mexican soil engaged in the perilous endeavor to protect the lives and property of American citizens in Mexico and bring to justice the murderers and assassins of our people who perished at their hands should be protected and reenforced by other soldiers, if need be, we are all agreed. There can be no division of sentiment on that subject. With this brief statement I pass it by for the moment.

As to the Navy, we have a very respectable one now in point of size. As to its efficiency there is much difference of opinion. We have been adding to it year by year and should continue to do so. But it seems to me that there is no reason for any great and sudden addition to it. That we should make it efficient and up to date goes without saying. The trouble is that we are proposing to put both our Army and Navy on a war footing, without apparent reason, and thereby add to the possibility or probability of war.

On another occasion I proposed the establishment of an industrial or constructive army to be engaged in work in the Forestry Service, reclamation, irrigation, building storage reservoirs to protect against storms and overflows, roads, and other service in the public interest, with military training for a part of the year, which would fit them for Army duty in case such service should become necessary. This would provide an adequate and dependable defense in case of war, add to the material welfare of the Nation, and provide a reserve force without the creation of a large standing army, which is so inimicable to our free institutions and the very nature and purpose of a free Republic.

Mr. President, have we just cause to fear war, and if so, why? Have we so conducted ourselves that our own course may well make us afraid? May the saying "The guilty flee when no man pursueth" be justly applied to us? Have we been inviting war and inciting our people to prepare for it, or have we in good faith, as a powerful civilized Nation, been doing those things which lead to and help to preserve peace with all nations? Is this not a time when we should search ourselves and look into the conscience of the Nation and see whether we are free from blame, whether this state of panic and hysteria in which we find our people has resulted, in whole or in part, from things done by us as a Nation or as citizens of the country that should not have been done? Some say the whole world hates us. Why, if it be so, are we the objects of this universal hatred of mankind? It is an appalling thing that this Nation should have become the victim of the twin evils, hate and fear, and the responsibility of finding the cause for it and removing that cause, if it is possible to do so, rests as a solemn duty upon this country. Are we going to do so by preparing for war by the means now proposed? Are the nations of the world going to think more of us when we have established militarism in this Republic, or are we endeavoring to put them in fear without increasing their respect for us?

This is a time when the American people may well pause to consider the wise and patriotic advice of George Washington in his Farewell Address as to our relations with other nations and take heed of that advice. He says:

> Observe good faith and justice toward all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great Nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt but, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it? Can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a Nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?
> In the execution of such a plan, nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others, should be excluded; and that in place of them, just and amicable feelings toward all should be cultivated.

The nation which indulges toward another an habitual hatred or an habitual fondness is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. Hence frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation, prompted by ill will and resentment, sometimes impels to war the government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty of nations, has been the victim.

So, likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest in cases where no common interest exists and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter without adequate inducement or justification. It leads also to concessions to the favorite nation of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted, or deluded citizens (who devote themselves to the favorite nation) facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity, gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation a commendable deference for public opinion or a laudable zeal for public good the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils! Such an attachment of a small or weak toward a great and powerful nation dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter. * * * Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike of another cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots who may resist the intrigues of the favorite are liable to become suspected and odious, while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people to surrender their interests.

Mr. President, this Farewell Address is a most wonderful document. The farseeing vision of this great patriot and statesman seems to have seen in advance the complications and dangers that were destined to confront us as a Nation; and his understanding and appreciation of them led him to warn, caution, and advise his countrymen not only of the dangers the Nation might be called upon to meet, but the means by which they might be minimized or prevented. Delivered on the occasion of his surrender of the control of affairs of his country, for which he had sacrificed so much, into the hands of others, his solicitude for his country's future is expressed with the solemnity and fervor the occasion must have inspired in his own mind. Looking back to that time, over more than a century of our country's history, his words seem like a prophecy and an inspiration. The dangers that seem to be threatening the Nation now appear to have been anticipated by its then Chief Magistrate and guarded against by his wisdom and foresight.

In solemn language, that seems almost pathetic, he expressed his own fears that his admonitions and advice would not "make the strong and lasting impression" he desired. He says:

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish; that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our Nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations; but if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism, this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

Mr. President, did his words make the strong and lasting impression on his countrymen that he so earnestly desired? Are we giving proper heed to his caution and advice in this time of war and conflict? Are we as citizens or as a Nation avoiding all antipathies against one nation and undue affection and sympathy for another respecting the conflict now raging in Europe? Are we really maintaining our neutrality as a Nation, or as individuals—as Washington so earnestly advised—or are we taking sides? If we are not heeding his advice, but are arraying ourselves on one side or the other of the struggle, what have we the right to expect but war?

We are told that the Christian people of the country are praying for an end to the war raging in Europe and the restoration of peace among nations. No one doubts the sincerity of these petitions for divine favor, but one would like to know their nature and purpose. Are they praying that right shall prevail and the war be concluded in such way as to benefit mankind and establish right and justice without regard to person or nation, or are they praying for the success of the allies on the one hand or the central powers on the other? Are they praying for a righteous peace that will redound to the good of mankind and tend to permanent peace among men? The prayer that one nation shall succeed against another will rise no higher than the head of the suppliant. God is not the arbitrator of armed conflicts between nations. His laws are laws of justice and righteousness and are unalterable.

The man or the nation that offends against these laws must some time and in some way suffer the penalty of the wrong done. In the divine purpose it is not a question of the success or defeat of one or the other of the contending nations. In this case, as in all others, it is a conflict between right and wrong that must be judged and determined by the immutable and eternal law of righteousness and justice. So it is with our own part in the conflict that is going on. This is a world question of right and wrong. Our sympathies must be with the right as against the wrong, and not with one nation or another. Therefore we should pray for knowledge and understanding as to what the right is, and when we know and understand our duty as individual citizens and as a nation our course is clear, and we should follow it uninfluenced by fear, favor, or affection. We can afford to be hated of men for righteousness sake. We can not afford to be hated justly because of our own wrongdoing.

War is itself an evil, but sometimes nations are called upon to choose between two evils, of which one is war. Prayers for peace may be mistaken prayers, and for that reason unavailing. While we may justly and reasonably hope that the time will come when wars must and will cease, we must admit that in the present state of human consciousness a righteous war, a war for principle, for justice, for liberty, and independence is nearer righteous than a dishonorable surrender of the rights of men and of nations and a pusillanimous peace. Reforms have often been attended with war, bloodshed, and persecution. Nations have been born and liberty and independence established by war. Our own Nation gained its freedom and independence by force of arms and untold bloodshed, suffering, and deprivation in military camp and on battle field and established the free and beneficent Republic under which we now live. Slavery was abolished in this country and over 4,000,000 human beings made free and our people reunited under one flag and one Republic by a long and bitter war.

It is not war that conquers evil or oppression but the truth or principle behind it. No war is necessary or justifiable unless it be for the establishment of some great fundamental principle of right or justice or humanity. The War of the Revolution was inspired by the love of liberty and independence. It resulted in the establishment of a free Republic on this continent that has endured for more than a century, and which, unless it is recreant to its trust and its free institutions, will continue to endure. Ostensibly the Civil War was fought by the South to maintain and preserve the rights of the States to free and independent action without the consent of other States or the National Government, in which they believed, and by the people of the North to maintain the Union of the States and the subjection of the individual States in certain respects to the Government in which they believed with equal sincerity. But, sir, above all this was the shadow of human slavery. In the providence of God this baleful shadow was dispelled by the sacrifices of the war, human slavery abolished, and the people reunited under a Republic free not only in name but in fact. It may be admitted that these same ends could have been accomplished in a better way and bloodshed and the many sufferings and sacrifices of war avoided. But no better way was seen and appreciated at the time, and these wars are justified in the minds of men by their beneficent and lasting results.

There is a class of very earnest Christian people in this country who denounce war as un-Christian and never justifiable. I quote extracts from a printed message of the Society of Friends entitled "The Spiritual Danger to the United States from War in Europe":

A MESSAGE FROM THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

To our fellow citizens:

On behalf of the Society of Friends (Quakers) we call your attention to the dangers that threaten the moral and spiritual interests of the United States, growing out of the war in Europe. We ask your prayerful consideration of these dangers and urge all patriotic Christian men and women to cooperate in averting them.

The material losses we ourselves suffer; the daily record of wholesale starvation, outrage, wounds, and death; our natural sympathy with one or the other of the warring powers—one or all of these may blind us to the un-Christian character of the struggle, or involve us in the rising tide of hatred that possesses Europe and may engulf the world, unless Christian love and trust hold it in check. We must not let the smoke of battle obscure our spiritual vision, nor allow our material needs and the commercial advantages growing out of the war to blind us to the wrong of violence nor dull our sense of righteousness and justice. We must not allow our inability to relieve the suffering or end this strife in Europe to harden our hearts nor to stand as an excuse for indifference on inaction.

The conflict in Europe must not be allowed to lessen our faith in spiritual forces, nor in the finer qualities of human nature. The thunder of the great guns may all too easily drown the still, small voice, and the menace of great battalions may make us forget the strength of faith, love, and justice. We are tempted to leave the path of open dealing, good will, unarmed good faith, and arbitration and "trust in chariots because they are many, and in horsemen because they are strong."

These dangers to the spirit of our people may bring a hurt to our life deeper than any material injury we are likely to suffer from the European war.

One of the most serious of these dangers is the widespread demand for an increase in our military and naval forces far beyond what may seem necessary for police service. Under cover of the plea for "adequate national defense" we are asked to enter upon the path that led Europe to fear and distrust, to rivalry in armaments, to the intolerable burden of an armed peace, and finally to its fear-stricken plunge into the horrors of the present war.

* * * * * * *

If we forsake the path of good will and arbitration and put our trust in "adequate armaments," we shall have continually to increase our forces to be adequately superior to the "adequate" forces raised by other powers to protect themselves from us. If we outstrip them, then in fear they will form ententes and alliances against us, and we shall require armaments equal to any such combination of powers before we are "adequately" armed.

* * * * * * *

The alternative to conscription is persistent and systematic agitation to excite a chronic fever of false patriotism and to stimulate fears and rumors of war. Rifle practice and military drill will be urged on our schools to revive in our boys the dying love of the pomp and circumstance of war and to make them skillful in the art of human slaughter. History will be distorted to create confidence in armed power and to make our youth forget that "they that take the sword shall perish with the sword." The military ambition of Army and Navy officials, the greed of armament makers and dealers in military supplies, and the adroit appeals of ambitious demagogues will agitate forever greater defenses. Newspapers will be subsidized, speakers enlisted, war scares manufactured. Under such influences confidence in treaties will be relaxed, arbitration sneered at as childish and impractical, and diplomacy will tend to rely on dreadnaughts instead of on reason, justice, and good will.

An increase of enlisted men and armaments by such means would infect our national spirit with a moral sickness, retard the progress of civilization, and replace the mind of Christian America with that of pagan Rome.

The Society of Friends has always believed that carnal warfare is un-Christian. We have tested the principles of Christian love and peace during more than two and a half centuries. In persecutions, in dealings with the Indians, in the early government of Pennsylvania, Friends found the spirit and teachings of Christ adequate to the demands of practical life, even as the early Christians were able to overcome the Roman Empire by righteousness, love, and faith.

Through such tests as these we have come to a firmer faith in the practicability of Christ's teaching in all phases of life. It is a most deadly form of unbelief for us to call Him Lord and yet regard His teachings as impracticable, to say that we believe in God as the Father Almighty and still doubt that righteousness and love are the surest defenses of a people. We appeal to you to help put away from our hearts the race hatred and the national greed and lusts from which wars and fightings come, to oppose the spirit of war in whatever guise it may appear, to preserve our national life from the hurt of militarism, and to seek that fruit of righteousness and faith in God, which is brotherhood and peace.

These are lofty and inspiring Christian sentiments, breathing the very spirit of peace. They should appeal strongly to the people of an enlightened and Christian Nation. I can not go so far as to say that war is never justifiable, as this message seems to maintain. Under the present state of human consciousness our Nation may be driven to war, as the only practical and present means of protection. But the sentiments so worthily expressed in this message are correct in principle. They will some time be established, and when they are, nations will go to war no more. Until then war should be the last means of settling disputes, and our aim should be to so educate and elevate human consciousness that nothing can lead or provoke men or nations to war.

Mr. President, what of the war now raging in Europe? What principle of right, justice, or humanity can be appealed to as a justification of the fearful sacrifice of lives and destruction of property that are devastating the greater part of Europe? What is the cause or the causes of this great and widespread conflict of arms. Some say it is militarism and the desire of Germany to destroy democracy and become the ruler of the world. Others maintain that it is a religious war, instigated for the advancement and domination of one of the churches of the world; still others that it is a contest for the commercial supremacy of the world and the domination of the sea. But can any one say that any or all of these contributed to bring on the war? If so, the alignment of the great nations engaged in the conflict is singular. It is a war of kings against kings, empire against empire. All kinds of religions are represented on both sides. The German Empire, an absolute monarchy, is arrayed against Russia, a despotism, and their national religions are different. While Germany is justly charged with militarism, England dominates and rules the ocean with the most powerful navy in the world. France, a Republic, is fighting alongside of Russia, a most despotic monarchy.

I pass by for the present moment the question whether Great Britain was forced into the war in defense of democracy or whether she was ready and willing to enter the conflict for other and less worthy reasons. It is enough to say that she is now in the grip of militarism, and the spirit of war reigns supreme. On this subject Jane Addams, one of the great women of this country, and who is an earnest and sincere advocate of peace, has this to say in the little book Women at The Hague:

We are told in England that this war, in essence, is a conflict between militarism and democracy, but the situation is obviously not so simple as that. War itself destroys democracy wherever it thrives and tends to entrench militarism. If the object of the war is to down militarism, it must be clear that the very prolongation of the war entrenches the military ideal not only in Russia and Germany but in the more democratic nations as well.

* * * * * * *

If you point out to an Englishman that democracy will not gain if German militarism is crushed and a new war party sits in every capital of Europe, he will tell you that such a situation, if it arises, must be attended to afterwards; that at present the allies are crushing the Prussian type of militarism. It seems clear, however, to the neutral observer that in the meantime, while the crushing process goes on, militarism is firmly lodged in men's minds, and that no body of men is seriously trying to discover how far militarism is being crushed by this war or how far civil forces are merely becoming exhausted and methods of negotiation discredited.

The matter of most serious concern for us is that this same spirit of militarism is being aroused, fostered, and maintained in our own country. Many good people are crying out for preparedness for national defense with the best of intentions. Many believe war is imminent and needs to be prepared for. Many are being frightened into this unfortunate belief by designing and interested influences, chief of which are the newspapers of the country owned and controlled by men who will be most benefited by a large Army and Navy and other proposed preparations for war. Of the influences of the public press, Miss Addams, in the same book to which I have already referred, very well says:

At moments I found myself filled with a conviction that the next revolution against tyranny would have to be a revolution against the unscrupulous power of the press.

There has never been a time in the history of this Republic when the unscrupulous power of the press has been wielded with greater violence or more insidious and disastrous effects. It is poisoning the minds of our people, inspiring them with fear, engendering and arousing in them a spirit of war and suspicion of the motives and purposes of the peoples of other and friendly nations, and bringing about a demoralization of thought and sentiment that, if not checked by better counsels and more patriotic guidance, will put this Nation on the road to militarism with all its dreadful consequences. The fearful ordeal through which the nations of Europe are passing should make us pause and consider the future of our own country before taking a step that leads to a like fate.

Mr. President, what are all these great nations, ruled by different ideas, having different forms of government, and representing all kinds of religions, really fighting about? Is it a struggle between democracy and militarism, absolutism and monarchy? If so, why this peculiar alignment of the contending forces? Is it love of liberty or love of any other great principle that has moved these nations or any of them to go to war with each other? Who can tell? Who can put his finger on the real cause of the fearful conflict now raging and in which we are so vitally interested? If it is a question of right on the one side and wrong on the other, if it is a conflict between good and evil, this Nation needs to pray, not for the success of one nation and the defeat of the other but that right may prevail and good overcome evil, whoever may suffer.

Mr. President, let us consider for a moment our own connection with the war and the duties and obligations that rest upon us as a civilized and peace-loving Nation. The President has very properly appealed to the people of the country to be neutral. That means that, as a Nation, we shall have no part in the war. Our duty then is not to any of the contending nations. It is confined to the protection of the lives, the rights, and the property of our own people by whatever nation they may be put in jeopardy. It follows necessarily that if we are neutral that must be done impartially the same as it relates to each and all of the nations. As we have declared our neutrality there is no principle for us to defend except such as affects directly the rights of our own people without regard to the question as to which of the contending nations are right and which wrong. As neutrals, however much we may sympathize with one nation as against the other, the right or wrong of the conflict as between the two is not for us to judge.

Then, sir, if that be so, why are we proposing to prepare for war? Have the rights of the people of this country been so far violated by any of the belligerent nations as to justify us in going to war with them? Does any Senator believe that the people of the United States want to go to war because of any wrongs that have been committed against our citizens by any of the nations at war? Is there a Member of this body that would favor a declaration of war against any nation because of anything that has happened so far? I say no, there is not one. Then, what are we afraid of? Why should we prepare for war? We have no intention, expectation, or desire to go to war with any other nation. If not, why should we expect or fear a war of aggression against us by any other nation? What have we done to incite or provoke any other nation to make war upon us? If we have ourselves given no cause or excuse for war against us and nothing has been done by any other nation for which we would think of going to war, why should this Congress burden the people with a large standing Army or a great Navy. Such a step would of itself be an invitation to war. We would say in effect come along with your armies and your navies; we are ready; we defy you to come.

If we could make any such preparations as are necessary for defense only and not for aggressive warfare, such as submarines and coast defenses, and make the world believe and understand that the sole object of our preparation is not for war but to preserve peace, this objection would be removed at least in part. But this is not what we propose to do and it may not be possible.

Mr. President, we have been wronged by more than one of the belligerent nations. Some of our citizens have lost their lives as the result of war and through the violence of one of the belligerent nations, and our people have been denied the freedom of the seas, and their trade with neutral nations unjustly and illegally interfered with by other belligerent nations. Does any one here believe that for these reasons this Nation should be plunged into war?

Let us stop to look into the circumstances under which these wrongs were committed and see whether they would justify a declaration of war in either case.

The Lusitania case, involving as it did the death of a number of American citizens, may be taken as the worst and most flagrant violation of the rights of a neutral nation. I hope no one outside of the country that committed the offense would attempt to justify or even excuse this grave crime against innocent men, women, and children. But, sir, there were extenuating and mitigating circumstances growing out of the acts of our own people that must in justice prevent us from resorting to extreme measures against the offending nation. The Lusitania was owned and operated by the subjects of one of the belligerent nations. She was loaded with munitions of war to be used in destroying the lives of the people of the nation by which the ship was destroyed and our people drowned. This destruction, brutal as it was, when we consider the loss of innocent lives it entailed was an act of war. It was done to protect their people from death by destroying the means of slaughter that we were sending to her enemies. I know it is said that international law permitted us to supply war materials to a belligerent nation. But the same law, the goods being contraband and carried by an enemy ship, permitted their interception and destruction.

If the ship had not carried American citizens as passengers, whose lives were sacrificed at the same time and by the same act, the right to destroy the ship and the war materials furnished by our people would not have been questioned. So, Mr. President, while we may justly condemn Germany for the destruction of the lives of our citizens, we can not in justice overlook the fact that other of our citizens, with the knowledge and acquiescence of our Government, invited and provoked the act by loading the ship with war materials destined for an enemy country to be used in the destruction of the lives of the subjects of the offending nation.

That we may better understand what the feeling in Germany is and how natural it is that such feelings should exist, let me quote a few words from a letter written from Germany by a native of this country then in that country:

> If you had seen what I saw yesterday you would understand my great, heart-rending bitterness. I saw a batch of 30 or 40 young, good-looking, strong soldiers, each one led by the arm by a civilian—a man or a woman—like small, helpless children. Every one of these poor boys was totally blind. An elderly woman of the people passed by. She broke out sobbing at the sight and said, "I could scream when I see such things, the poor soldiers!" They seemed quite cheerful, but were very silent. Only some of them had the iron cross. Poor fellows! It is quite common to see men without an arm or a leg. Do you think they admire America, which has sent most of the ammunition which causes this misery? It would make your face burn with shame to hear what I must listen to every day.

Mr. President, we may well feel ashamed of our country when some of our own citizens, as a means of making money, are supplying the means that are bringing about such lamentable results. The mere reminder that we have for mercenary reasons made our country a party to the maiming of the young men of a friendly nation should make us pause. To make our part in it still worse, passengers were allowed to take passage on the Lusitania knowing that she was loaded with war materials. Not only that, but the passengers were notified not to travel on the ship and knew that she would be in peril and was marked for destruction.

I submit, Mr. President, that under these circumstances while we may still complain that Germany went to the extreme of taking the lives of our citizens and demand indemnity for this loss of life, we could find no just ground, resulting from the wrongful act, for going to war on that account. Our own hands are not clean. We provoked the act. We must in shame and humiliation confess that but for the greed of our people to make profit out of the misfortunes of the warring nations, citizens of our country would not have lost their lives.

Now, sir, while I am on the subject let me say a few words on the general subject of the exportation of arms and munitions of war to the belligerent nations. There can be no question that we are, by supplying the munitions of war, aiding to prolong the conflict. Let us admit for the purposes of the argument that the trade in such munitions is not forbidden by international law. It must be admitted, on the other hand, that international law does not require it, and that to withhold such aid would not violate the law. In other words, the law permits us to sell the belligerent nations such munitions but imposes upon us no obligation to do so.

Then let me ask, are we morally justifiable in thus supplying the means of carrying on this cruel and devastating war under the circumstances as they exist? Some say yes, because we are furnishing them to the allies and the allies are fighting for a principle and are in the right. Others do not think so. But let us concede that point, and then what? If we are furnishing this aid to one belligerent as against the other because we believe that nation is right and the other wrong, we have made our Nation a belligerent and subject to be treated as such. We would no longer be neutral. We would have made it our war.

But, Mr. President, our citizens who are furnishing war materials are not doing it for any such reason or with any such purpose. With them it is a cold-blooded neutral—I had almost said inhuman—question of making money. They supply materials to England and Russia alike, maybe to Turkey. They would if they could. They would furnish them to Germany and Austria-Hungary with very great pleasure if they could do it with profit to themselves. It is not a matter of principle with them, but a question of money. And I want to say and emphasize the fact that this trade in munitions of war has brought about most, if not all, of the complications between us and the belligerent nations on both sides and has engendered most of the hatred of the belligerent nations under which we are suffering. But for that the Lusitania would not have been torpedoed, the lives of our citizens lost, and our friendly relations with Germany put in jeopardy. Germany hates and distrusts us because we are furnishing her enemy the means of slaying her soldiers and prolonging the war. Great Britain justifies herself for interfering with our ocean travel by insisting that we are making so much out of the exportation of arms and munitions of war that we are not injured by the cutting off of a part of our other trade. England hates us because we are trading on her misfortunes while pretending to be her friend. She knows that we are not furnishing her war materials out of sympathy or love for her or for any other laudable reason, but are making all the money out of her we can while the war lasts. Does anyone wonder that we are hated and despised by both sides of the war? The motives of the men who are growing rich out of this trade in arms are not held in very high esteem at home. There is another unfortunate side to it. We are doing a great deal of boasting and self-congratulation at our prosperity, particularly our great export trade. Everybody knows that our extraordinary export trade is the result of the exportation of arms, munitions, and war supplies. But for this the exportations would not be extraordinary. In other words, we are prospering and growing fat on the misfortune of other friendly nations. It is not a thing to boast about. It is not just ground for congratulation. It is something that should humiliate and force us to silence.

So long as we carry on this nefarious trade we can not, with moral force or justification, make England's encroachments on our ocean trade a cause for war. Morally speaking, we have closed the door against any very serious complaint of any of the belligerent nations for searching our ships and interfering with our trade, whatever our legal rights may be. However much Great Britain may profit by our sale to her of arms and munitions of war she has every reason to treat us with contempt for the part we are taking in the war solely for profit.

Mr. President, what we need to prepare for is not war, but peace. The world is just what the world thinks and what the world thinks it will do, sooner or later, be it good or bad, unless the thought is changed. As a nation thinketh so is it. For many years before the war broke out into physical conflict the great nations of Europe had been mentally at war. It was only a question of time, if they continued the war in mind, that physical war would come. Thoughts of jealousy, hate, malice, revenge, and selfishness had been instilled into the minds of the people of the nations of Europe against each other. The war that is now raging is only a manifestation of the mental condition that prevailed and preceded it. The seeds of discord, hate, and war had been sown in the minds of the people, and this fearful war is the fruitage of that wrong thinking and teaching. No crime was ever committed that was not first conceived and thought of in the mind of the perpetrator. Crime is only the manifestation and result of evil, criminal thinking. All evil is a mental process that may do its work only by thinking, but which may and often does manifest itself in physical action. Some were led to believe that the war in Europe was caused by the assassination of a member of the royal family of Austria. Few believe now that this was either the immediate or even the remote cause of the conflict. The war in Europe came because the minds of the people had been gradually but surely prepared for war. The assassination, at most, was only an excuse for the precipitation of a war that was already in the minds of the nations and ready to break out at any moment.

Now, sir, what is our duty to the people of our own country? Is it to prepare for war or for peace? So long as we are thinking right about war and peace and living up to our thinking this Nation is in no danger of war. But are we? The minds of our people are being filled with thoughts of war, thus crowding out the wholesome thoughts of peace. They are put in daily fear of war. They are being taught to anticipate and expect it. As a consequence they are led to think the country must prepare to meet by force of arms the evil they are made to expect. The efforts to instill into the minds of our people the fear and anticipation of war, to make it in their minds a reality, to excite them to the belief that the Nation must prepare for war is a crime against a whole Nation, against all mankind. The newspapers are filled with predictions of war under scare headlines, civic bodies vie with each other in the effort to frighten the people into the belief that preparation for war is necessary and to force Congress, through fear and the coercive effect of a manufactured public opinion, to provide armies, ships, and fortifications to resist a purely imaginary military or naval force. The whole thing is supremely absurd. It is not the worst that such legislation and preparation will add millions of taxes to the present tax burdens of the people. It is the danger of a great standing army and huge navy. That is bad enough, but the effect such a course will have upon the minds of the people of the country is infinitely worse. It will teach them militarism. It will instill into their minds the false belief that the safety of a nation can only be made sure by preparation for war. It will teach them to put their trust in armies and navies instead of the God of righteousness and peace. It will teach them the false lesson that military force is a safer security of a nation than right thinking and right doing. It will turn our peaceful Republic, governed by the civil authorities through peaceful means, to the rule of a military oligarchy that rules only by force. It will pervert and sooner or later overthrow our free republican institutions. The man who seeks to put this Nation in the way that leads to military rule will help to bring the very existence of his country into deadly peril.

Mr. President, civilization is no proof against the inhuman war spirit. We must go deeper than that if we are going to put an end to war. Nations are only aggregations of men. They can not rise above the citizenship of which they are composed. Therefore all efforts toward the establishment of peace amongst nations must reach the individual citizen. A nation made up of men and women who will war with their neighbors, war in their churches, in politics, in the various peaceful walks of life, and within themselves is a nation that will go to war with another nation. Good and evil are constantly at war between man and man within the consciousness of the individual as well as between nations, and until good overcomes evil in the minds of the people who constitute separate nations we can not expect universal peace. The greatest of the evils that result in quarrels among men and war between nations is selfishness. Men are selfish. Nations composed of men are likewise selfish. The fearful war now raging in Europe is the result of human selfishness. One nation may be fighting for access to the sea for its commerce, another for commercial supremacy on the ocean, another for an increase of territory, another to recover territory lost by previous wars, and still another for hate or revenge. All of these are selfish reasons. In addition to and in support of those mentioned, the cry of patriotism and love of country is raised, one of the most selfish appeals of all. We invoke national patriotism as against other nations, as against the whole world. We forget that we owe an unselfish duty to all humanity, an international patriotism, world-wide in its scope and unlimited in its generous love of all mankind. The selfish consideration of national rights and national gain and advantage engenders war between nations just as like considerations by individual men and women engender strife, bloodshed, litigation, and controversies of all kinds among men. To meet this sense of limited patriotism an international court should be established to settle disputes between nations, with full and ample jurisdiction to deal with all disputes, extending even to questions of national honor.

We must realize that the way to peace among nations is to eliminate selfishness from the consciousness of the men and women who constitute nations. Until we do we shall have strife among men and among nations. Therefore peace plans and the advocacy of peace are good as a means of educating men to avoid war and foster peace, but when we teach them to love God and their fellow men, peace will be assured. Jesus of Nazareth, the Man of Peace, said: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it. Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Uniform obedience to these divine commandments would establish universal and eternal peace among men and nations. But we do not obey them. We serve other gods before Him. One of these gods, and to our minds, the most powerful of all, is money. In one of the great peace meetings called to form a peace league and composed of many of the most distinguished men and women of this country, it was proposed to include in its declaration of principles a provision against the exportation of war materials to belligerent nations. It was voted down. What a spectacle! This was serving mammon, not God. But they did insert a provision that a nation refusing to obey such peace regulations as might be provided for to prevent war should be forced to do so. So this great peace organization, at its very birth, indorsed the right and the practice of a neutral nation to aid and assist in carrying on a war between other nations, and declared in favor of making nations peaceful by force. You can not make men honest or unselfish by law. You can not make men or nations peaceful by force. Economic pressure or coercion, as by withdrawal of trade, for example, might justly be applied as against a nation that insists upon going to war, and might be justifiable and effective, but actual force would be inconsistent with the very object sought to be attained.

The establishment of universal peace amongst men and nations is a consummation devoutly to be hoped; but we should not delude ourselves with the belief or hope that this can be accomplished by peace plans or regulations. The people of all nations must be brought to love God with all their hearts, with all their souls, with all their minds, and their neighbors as themselves. They must be taught to serve the one and true God only, to love peace and hate war, and to be patriotic, not to their own nation only but to the people of all the nations of the world. Especially is this true of the rulers and leaders of all nations. It is they and not the masses of the people who make war. The brotherhood of men of all nations and of all tongues must be established and maintained in the minds and consciences of men. Thus will universal peace be established. It can not be established in any other way.

Mr. President, by enlarging our military and naval establishment we are not preparing this Nation for peace, but for war. We are adding fuel to the conflagration that is spreading over Europe. We are preparing the minds of our people to catch the flame and burn like tinder. We are teaching our people to think war and to depend upon it as an instrument of good instead of a devastating, consuming evil. If the Congress of the United States enters upon this unfortunate course, it will take upon itself a fearful responsibility. There may be times, as I have said, when war may be justified as a choice of two evils. It is possible but not probable that this Nation may some time be called upon to defend itself by force of arms. The call of humanity may some time compel us to resort to force of arms to vindicate the rights of the oppressed and civilization, morality, law, and order on this continent. We may be impelled to such action by a high sense of duty; but if we do, the means will be provided. When a nation resorts to force, to such an end and with such a motive, previous military preparation will not be needed. It will not take the form of militarism; it will not excite a lust for war. The duty will be too solemn, the obligation too sacred to engender the thought of evil. If this shall not be true, the duty will not exist, and this country had better hold its hand until the duty is imperative.

Mr. President, no more unfortunate, no more dangerous time for even considering or thinking of preparation for war than this could have been chosen. A great portion of the civilized world is ablaze with war. The minds of men engaged in the conflict are aflame with passion, malice, and deadly hatred. Lives are being brutally sacrificed in the deadly conflict. Even our own peaceful country, far from the seat of war and with an ocean flowing between, is full of excitement and apprehension. Many of our naturalized citizens, good and loyal citizens, are taking the side of their native country, and who would not, where the conflict is between foreign nations of which their fatherland is one. Our supply of arms and munitions to the enemies of the country of their nativity, with which to kill and maim their fathers, brothers, and countrymen, has made them sensitive and resentful. And who can find it in his heart to condemn them when the country of their adoption is not assailed and the exercise of their allegiance called for. They feel, and not without reason, that under the circumstances their adopted country is not being neutral but is discriminating against the "old country." On the other hand, the native-born citizens of the belligerent nations that are being supplied with war materials feel and protest that to cut off the supply of war materials now would be an act of unneutrality and an injustice to the country of their birth for which they retain a natural affection. These conflicting feelings on the part of our own people, natural and to be expected, make it peculiarly our duty to maintain the strictest neutrality.

Mr. President, what we need to do above everything else at a time like this is to pacify, soothe, and reassure the public mind, to think and talk peace, not war; to inspire confidence that the American people and their Government have the desire and the ability to maintain and continue peaceful and friendly relations with all the world. "Peace on earth, good will toward men" should be the watchword of the people of this Republic.

This is a time when the whole Nation, as taught by Jesus of Nazareth, the man of love and peace, should join in the universal Christian prayer, "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil."

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 706) to amend section 260 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, at 20 minutes before 2 o'clock—the hour at which the unfinished business will be taken up—I made the motion to take up this judiciary bill, and I really thought I would have the time between then and 2 o'clock to finish what I desired to say upon the subject. As I begin now, only three minutes before 2, I have taken the precaution to ask the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] whether it would interfere with the conduct of the Indian bill for me, even though the hour of 2 o'clock arrives and the Indian bill is laid before the Senate, to finish what I desire to say; and as I find it will not embarrass him, I will proceed now and continue after 2 o'clock.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it likely that no objection will be interposed, but the Senator will have to deal with the Senate rather than with the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Under the rules the Senator having the floor at 2 o'clock is entitled to proceed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not if the unfinished business is laid before the Senate and it is not agreed by unanimous consent that it shall be laid aside.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; Mr. President, it has been ruled a dozen times since I have been in the Senate that the Senator having the floor at 2 o'clock does not lose the floor when the unfinished business is laid before the Senate. My reason for inquiring of the Senator from Arizona was that I did not desire to consume the time of the Senate in such a way as to interfere with his control of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. SMOOT. The remarks of the Senator after 2 o'clock will be made on the unfinished business and not upon his bill, which then will not be before the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no objection to that, of course, if that was the Senator's purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That was what I meant; and I wish to assure the Senator from New Hampshire that there was no purpose upon my part to make an arrangement with the Senator from Arizona in disregard of the rights of the entire Senate.

Mr. President, Senate bill 706 provides a remedy for a trouble which now exists in connection with our circuit and district courts. It is intended to complete a plan for the relief of the Federal district and circuit courts. By the terms of the Constitution the judicial power is vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish, and the judges shall hold their office during good behavior. It was found years ago that some relief must be given against the presence upon the bench of Federal judges advancing in years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Georgia suspend? The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 10385) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was found years ago necessary to protect the administration of justice in the circuit and district courts against the failure of the judges to do their full work owing to advancing years, and for this reason an act of Congress was passed permitting Federal judges to retire at the age of 70 with full pay.

Unquestionably the subject before Congress when that act was passed was the designation of a time after which, probably, the district and circuit court judges would not be in a position to do efficient work. Seventy was named as a time when they could retire with full pay, upon the theory that having reached three score and ten—the allotted period certainly of active life, if not of life—it was not to be expected that they would be able to continue to fill the offices they held and measure up to the responsibility of those offices.

Later on it has been found that even the provision allowing judges to retire at 70 does not meet the situation.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. WORKS. Does not the Senator from Georgia think it would be very much better to make retirement compulsory at 70?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not sure that it could be done.

Mr. WORKS. It could not under the Constitution, undoubtedly; it would be necessary to amend the Constitution; but does not the Senator think that would be much better than conditions as they exist at the present time?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think it would be better than the conditions as they now exist, but I do not think that is preferable to the plan we now lay before the Senate. I believe we have worked out the very best way to handle this subject.

I was stating, Mr. President, that experience has shown that the provision allowing judges to retire at 70 did not fully meet the trouble that caused the act to be passed which allowed them to retire. A number of judges reaching 70 did not retire but retained office and failed to do the full work of their office. The desire to hold office, the desire to have something to do, in many instances, the desire, perhaps, in some cases, to retain the patronage connected with the office, prevented circuit and district judges from retiring at 70. They are now, in a number of instances, holding office to the detriment of the proper discharge of the duties of the offices which they fill and they are thereby preventing a proper administration of justice.

Mr. President, so necessary was it that relief should be given against the Federal judges who were past 70 that the subject came before the Department of Justice for consideration, and the very first paragraph of the report of the Attorney General in 1913 calls attention to this subject and requests legislation. We all know that Mr. Justice McReynolds, now of the Supreme Court Bench, was then Attorney General, and the first paragraph of his report in 1913 urges this subject upon the attention of Congress and requests legislation.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield further to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I do not remember the language of the report. Does the Attorney General undertake to say how many judges should be appointed to take the place of those retired?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to read an extract from his report.

Mr. WORKS. Does the Senator know the number who are regarded as unable to perform the duties of the office?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Attorney General in 1913 asked that in every case in which a circuit or district judge had passed 70 a new judge should be appointed. If that were done, there would be 14 new judges to be appointed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. That principle would have retired Chief Justice Marshall long before he surrendered his duties as Chief Justice, would it not?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think it would.

Mr. GALLINGER. Ten years before.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think it would, and therefore we have not followed the exact language or the exact recommendation of the then Attorney General, now Mr. Justice McReynolds.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. COLT. Is it not true that Justice McReynolds in his report recommends that it be mandatory upon the President to appoint?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; I am on the point of reading his recommendation.

Mr. COLT. As I understand from the frame of this bill, it is discretionary on the part of the President to appoint?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is.

Mr. COLT. Then I might ask the Senator where he finds in the Constitution of the United States any power vested in the President of the United States to create the office of judge?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. None; and this bill does not leave him to create it. The bill creates the office and requires it to be filled by him upon the finding of certain facts.

Mr. COLT. Is not an office created when it rests with the volition of the President to fill it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That volition is to be exercised in the finding of certain facts. Upon finding them he is to fill the office. The act creates the office.

Mr. COLT. If you turn to the Constitution of the United States——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not yield for an argument to the Senator.

Mr. COLT. I beg pardon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia declines to yield further.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I prefer the Senator to make his argument in his own time.

I do not intend at this time to refer to the constitutionality of this act. I shall take it up a little later on. What I wish now to do is to bring to the attention of the Senate the recommendation of Mr. Justice McReynolds, then Attorney General. I read his first recommendation:

1. Judges of United States courts, at the age of 70, after having served 10 years, may retire upon full pay. In the past many judges have availed themselves of this privilege. Some, however, have remained upon the bench long beyond the time when they were capable of adequately discharging their duties, and in consequence the administration of justice has suffered.

I stop to call attention to the fact that the Attorney General admonishes us that the administration of justice has suffered from the condition that has existed.

His recommendation proceeds, as follows:

The power of Congress to correct this condition is limited by the provision of the Constitution that judges shall hold their offices during good behavior. I suggest an act providing when any judge of a Federal court below the Supreme Court fails to avail himself of the privilege of retiring now granted by law, that the President be required, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint another judge, who shall preside over the affairs of the court and have precedence over the older one. This will insure at all times the presence of a judge sufficiently active to discharge promptly and adequately the duties of the court.

Mr. President, the Attorney General recommended that we should require the President to add the additional judge. I do not object to that provision. If Senators look upon it as a constitutional question and prefer that it should be required, I would be willing to yield to their constitutional scruples, although I am sure it is not necessary to carry the statute so far to take it outside of any possible question as to its constitutionality.

The real necessity for such legislation is the subject to which, first, I wish to address myself. We are admonished it is necessary by the Department of Justice, not only by Mr. Attorney General McReynolds making this report in 1913, but his report was followed with the same language by his successor, Attorney General Gregory, in 1914, and followed in substantially the same language by the Attorney General in 1915.

What does that mean? It means that the Department of Justice, familiar with the work that is being done in the various district and circuit courts of the United States, with the large volume of business for the Government before those courts, feels that it is necessary to relieve the courts against inefficient work by judges past 70 years of age.

But it has been suggested that where a judge past 70 fails to retire and the business of the court suffers from his age, relief can be given by a special statute authorizing an appointment such as this bill authorizes. Evidently the Department of Justice did not consider such a course was sufficient. Evidently the experience of the Department of Justice was that separate bills have not met the requirements, and it is easy to point out that they have not and do not.

In the fifth circuit there is a circuit court judge who has not been upon the bench in four years and who for four years before had not been upon the bench half the time the court was in session. For four years he has been confined at his home. He is 82 years old. For 12 years he has had the privilege of retiring, and he would not retire. Bill after bill has been introduced to provide an additional judge for the circuit, and it has never gone through Congress. Here is proof of the fact that the individual bill remedy does not meet the situation. That circuit also has another judge 78 years old upon the bench who to-day can not do the work that he did 20 years ago or 10 years ago. Why do they not retire? I believe largely and principally because they dread to have nothing to do.

This bill meets that trouble. It names a new judge to carry the burden of the work and leaves the older judge, still with judicial authority and judicial power, subject to assignment for special work. There is ample work to occupy them, even if the additional judges are appointed.

A judge past 70 may be unable to stand the fatigue, the labor, the mental and physical strain of the entire work of a district, but he could do work half the time and work well. He could be assigned to some district by the Chief Justice where his work was needed to relieve a crowded docket. If there is need for it he can help in his own district. He still can be called on to serve his country and do his work to the extent of his physical capacity. This bill will enable the Government to obtain much valuable service from judges who otherwise would retire on full pay.

The recommendation of the Attorney General was brought to my attention by two United States court judges, one a district and the other a circuit judge, each past 70, who did not wish to quit entirely but were anxious that the bill recommended by the Attorney General should pass, and that they might still contribute to the service of their country while they were drawing a salary such work as their country might need from them.

This bill not only makes it certain that there will be an active judge to handle the business of the district and the circuit, thereby insuring to litigants the prompt and efficient attention they are entitled to for their business, thereby insuring to the Government the prompt and efficient trial of Government cases, but it will be a great economy. Where a district court judge is old and slow the cost to the Government in the Government business of its witnesses and the administration of the court far exceed the mere salary of an additional judge.

The judges themselves, at least a majority of them whom I know and from whom I have heard, are desirous that this bill shall pass. I have a letter from a retired district court judge in Wyoming or Idaho expressing regret that we did not extend the bill so as to allow those who had already retired to do work to the extent of their continuing strength.

But it has been suggested that this bill ought to have been entitled "A bill to provide additional offices for deserving Democrats." Mr. President, that means that it ought to be postponed until such time as perhaps unfortunately a Republican will be President, and then it ought to be passed under circumstances which will provide for the appointment of Republicans.

Mr. GALLINGER. In the near future.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hope not, but I am not sure. I am not the prophet that some of my friends are, and I do not know. I admit that I have great confidence in the voters, and I hope and believe that the change is not speedily to be made. But suppose it were true that it meant there would be 14 additional Democratic judges, there would not be a third of the district and circuit court bench then Democratic. I confess that I fail to see the difference between a Democrat and a Republican judge. There was a time when a different view as to constitutional construction separated the lawyers of the two parties, but I am not sure now whether as to constitutional construction a Republican is a Democrat or a Democrat is a Republican. Some of the best Democrats I know on constitutional construction sit upon the other side of the Chamber, and I can not deny that some who have very different views from mine upon the subject sit on this side.

Now, the question of politics has nothing to do with the bench any longer. I can pick men on the other side who are good enough constitutional constructionists to satisfy my strictest view of constitutional limitations, and I am sometimes afraid of growing lax in that regard myself from association. Now——

Mr. WORKS. Before the Senator leaves that——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I am very sorry to have any such suggestion brought into this discussion which relates to judicial officers. I wish to say in this connection that in my judicial district we have had Democratic judges for the last 20 years, and I think they are two of the best men and the best judges who have ever sat on the bench in this or any other country.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I want it distinctly understood that I did not bring it in. I am answering the argument of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and I am not criticizing him for making it. I am simply endeavoring to answer it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND rose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In discussing this bill the other day it is true, as the Senator from Georgia has said, that I suggested it ought to be entitled "A bill to provide 17 places for deserving Democrats." I still adhere to that opinion. But, Mr. President, I do not object to a Democrat being appointed to the bench. I do not object to Democratic judges. I agree with the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] that some of the best judges we have in the country are Democrats. The judge who sat on the district bench in Utah ever since it was a State until quite recently was a Democrat, a Democrat of the old school, and one of the best judges it has ever been my good fortune to know. So I do not make that objection; but the objection I have to the bill is that it makes the courts of the country the plaything of politics—not that there would be any objection to the judges who might be appointed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, it does nothing of the sort. It provides an intelligent, sound way to prevent the courts from having old, inefficient judges without requiring that each time we shall come to Congress, and frequently not get relief. The plaything——

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can not yield. I ask the Senator to excuse me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia declines to yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to say something just now myself.

It would make a plaything of judicial office to bring the need of relief to Congress each time a judge held on past the age of efficiency instead of allowing the information to come from the Department of Justice to the President as to the condition of business in a district or circuit, and letting action come automatically in consequence of the condition.

Now, Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from California. There is no politics in this bill, and there ought to be none. There was no abler or more cordial supporter of this bill at the last Congress——

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield further to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do, because it seems I have given the Senator from California more credit than I ought to have given him.

Mr. WORKS. I did not intend to say that there is no politics in this bill. I do not know whether there is or not. I was defending the judiciary from any insinuation that politics could in any way enter into the service or the work of the judges or the judicial office. I was not discussing the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I agree fully with the Senator from California, and I will agree with him——

Mr. COLT. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just a moment. I would have agreed with him still further if he had added there was no politics in the origin of this bill, and there will be none at any time unless it was organized upon the other side to resist it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. For a question, but not more.

Mr. COLT. If the Senator will pardon me, I heartily concur with what the Senator has said in regard both to Democratic judges and Republican judges, as well as with what the Senator from California has said. I have sat on the bench in the circuit court of appeals with a Democrat for about 20 years. Two or three of the judges of the first circuit are Democrats, and I wish to say that politics never enter into the judicial office. The senior circuit judge who now presides in the circuit court of appeals of the first circuit is a Democrat, whose judicial attainments and standing in every relation of life are the very highest.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to say that my first appearance in the United States circuit court in the argument of an important case was before Mr. Justice Bradley, and I can go further and state that, with 35 years of experience at the bar, I never appeared before a judge whom I regarded as being abler or fairer. I would have been willing for him to be in charge of all the Federal business I was ever called upon to try, certainly as willing to have him as any other judge before whom I ever appeared.

Mr. President, let us come back to the question of this bill. I wish to answer the argument of the Senator from Utah. I wish to answer his designation of this bill as a bill which should be entitled "A bill to provide 14 places for deserving Democrats."

The bill came from an Attorney General who was as far from being partisan as any man who ever filled the office. He went into the Department of Justice under a Republican administration as an Assistant Attorney General. The record he made then and the record he made in connection with Government business under employment by a Republican administration caused his selection as Attorney General. His management of the Department of Justice was so free from politics that I think he retained too many Republicans in office. Nobody can suspect that the origin of this bill coming from him has politics in it.

At the last session of Congress it had no more cordial supporter than the great Senator from New York who preceded the able Senator from New York, who now presides over this body [Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair]. Mr. Root was upon the subcommittee and cordially supported this bill. It just happens that at the time we press it now there is a Democratic President, but surely this should not cause partisan opposition to so worthy a measure.

Now, I come to the exact provisions of the bill. Under the language of the bill, wherever a judge has passed 70 and has served 10 years, and is therefore entitled to retire on full pay, the President, in the language of the bill, may, if, in his opinion the public good requires, appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an additional judge, and thereafter the new judge will carry the responsibility of the business. Thereafter the new judge of the circuit court will sit regularly instead of the older judge. In the district court the new judge will have charge of the business.

The old circuit court judge can be assigned to sit in his circuit or in any other circuit or for special work by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court Bench. The district court judge can sit in any district in his circuit at the request of the presiding judge of the circuit court or sit elsewhere by the request of the Chief Justice. We use the judges who have passed the age of complete activity to help supplement the work and prevent our dockets from being crowded anywhere by reason of sickness or other causes. We thus have the ripe experience of one of these judges past 70 who can hold court and do the work, perhaps, as well or better than ever in his life, and yet who could not stand six or eight months of solid work. We get the benefit of the services of such judges instead of retiring them. We still give them something to do, instead of forcing them to retire, and yet we have the work of the district and the circuit actively and fully discharged.

A judge from California, who is past 70 years of age, was here recently—a United States circuit judge, I think—and he expressed his deep interest in this bill, as he would be glad to continue to do what he was physically able to do, but he felt he would have to retire unless he was relieved of doing all of the work of his office.

What would be the effect of this bill? I grant that in most cases a new judge would be appointed. The Attorney General recommended that we require such appointment in all cases. At the last session of Congress the bill was reported in that shape, but the Judiciary Committee of the other House unanimously reported it with the language of limitation, providing that the President shall only make the appointments when, in his opinion, the good of the public requires it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator says that the bill was unanimously reported from the Judiciary Committee of the House, as I understand him.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I did not say that. I said that it was unanimously reported by the Judiciary Committee of the House. I said it was reported by the committee of the Senate——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That was what I undertook to say, but perhaps I did not say it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Utah did not understand me. I carefully guarded my language.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Georgia, I think, misunderstood me. I was undertaking to repeat what the Senator had said, namely, that there was a unanimous report from the Judiciary Committee of the House.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, my understanding is that there was a very vigorous dissent. I have forgotten all of their names, but there were two, at least, of the committee who dissented. One of them was Mr. GRAHAM and another was Mr. VOLSTEAD, of Minnesota, who dissented in quite a vigorous minority report.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was advised to the contrary; I was told that the House committee reported unanimously in favor of the bill at the last Congress. I understand there is a dissent in the present Congress.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It may be that the dissent was during this Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes. At the present Congress the Judiciary Committee first reported the bill without objection, but subsequently certain members of the committee, having changed their minds, asked leave to dissent; the leave was granted, and they have filed a written dissent.

Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] raises the point that this bill is a delegation of legislative authority, and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] made the same suggestion. The language of the bill is:

> The President, if in his opinion the public good so requires, may appoint.

The word "may" as used of course means "must"; the term "may," used in connection with a public duty, is so construed; but if there is doubt entertained by Senators about it, I shall ask that the Senate change the word "may" to "shall." The words "if, in his opinion, the public good so requires," in my opinion mean if, in his opinion, the conduct of the business of the courts so requires. I think that that is a fair construction of the language—if, in his opinion, the conduct of the business of the court so requires, or if, in his opinion, the business of the court would be thereby more efficiently administered; or if, in his opinion, the more efficient administration of the business of the court so requires. That is substantially the meaning of the language now used in the bill; but if anybody doubts it I am ready to substitute the language which I have read, or substantially that language.

Mr. President, I recognize the fact that Congress can not delegate a legislative power. That principle is too well established to be questioned; but what is a delegation of a legislative power is a vastly different proposition. In case after case our Supreme Court has held that delegations of power to branches of the administration to attend to details and to pass upon details to make legislative enactments effective were not delegations of legislative power. You can not delegate the power to make an act, but you can by an act delegate the power to pass upon certain facts under which the effectiveness of the act begins. I do not recall a case in which the Supreme Court of the United States has held an act of Congress unconstitutional on account of the delegation of power. I have not made an exhaustive search, but I do not recall one such decision. I do, however, recall case after case where an act of Congress authorized the Secretary of War or the President or other branches of the administrative department to pass upon certain facts, to determine even what the public good required, to make the act effective, and the Supreme Court of the United States has held that it was not a delegation of legislative power, but it was a legislative enactment that permitted another branch of the Government to pass upon facts from which the act would be effective.

We are all familiar with the embargo cases in the earliest part of the history of our country; we are familiar with the McKinley tariff law; we are familiar with the fact that in these acts the President was allowed to find what the public good required, what the public interest required, and to suspend a tariff or embargo or to put in force a tariff as he found the facts so to require in the interest of the Government; and the Supreme Court of the United States sustained those acts. Why, we have ourselves, since I have been in the Senate, passed the Panama Canal bill, under which the President absolutely created the offices needed in the Canal Zone by his orders and regulations, and then filled them. In the case of the Hawaiian Islands, the act providing for the organization of the government of the Hawaiian Islands permitted the President to create the courts by regulation and to name the judges.

I have, Mr. President, quite a number of acts of Congress where such a delegation of power was given, which I will hand to the Reporter, and which I ask to have printed at the end of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I think the most interesting case decided by the Supreme Court of the United States on this subject is the case of Union Bridge Co. against the United States, in Two hundred and fourth United States Reports, page 365. In that case the court reviews a number of the older cases, especially the case of Field against Clark, in One hundred and forty-third United States Reports.

In the case of Field against Clark the question arose as to the constitutionality of that section of the McKinley Tariff Act of 1890 which provided for the imposition in a named contingency—to be determined by the President and manifested by his proclamation—of duties on sugar, molasses, and other specified articles which the act had placed in the free list. The act provided:

> Whenever or so often as the President shall be satisfied that the Government of any country producing or exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, etc., imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural or other products of the United States which he may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable he shall have the power and it shall be his duty to suspend, by proclamation to that effect, the provisions of this act relating to the free introduction of such sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, the production of such country, for such time as he shall deem just.

He was allowed to pass upon the question as to whether certain conduct was "reciprocally unequal and unreasonable," and to keep the tariff duty upon the products of such country "for such time as he shall deem just." And that was held not to be a delegation of legislative authority. In the Union Bridge Co. case acts are cited as precedents which were also cited in the case of Field against Clark, as follows:

> The result of that examination of legislative precedents was thus stated: The authority given to the President by the act of June 4, 1794, to lay an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports of the United States "whenever, in his opinion, the public safety shall so require"—

The act of Congress did not undertake to decide what the public safety would require, but left it to the President to pass upon the question of what the public safety required—> and under regulations, to be continued or revoked "whenever he shall think proper," by the act of February 9, 1799, to remit and discontinue for the time being the restraints and prohibitions which Congress had prescribed with respect to commercial intercourse with the French Republic "if he shall deem it expedient and consistent with the interest of the United States" and "to revoke such order whenever in his opinion the interest of the United States shall require"; by the act of December 19, 1806, to suspend for a named time the operation of the nonimportation act of the same year "if in his judgment the public interest should require it"; by the act of May 1, 1810, to revive a former act as to Great Britain or France if either country had not by a named day so revoked or modified its edicts as not "to violate the neutral commerce of the United States."

The broad privilege of determining what violated and what did not violate the neutral commerce of the United States was to be passed upon by the President in determining whether or not the provisions of the act should apply.

> By the acts of March 3, 1815, and May 31, 1830, to declare the repeal, as to any foreign nation, of the several acts imposing duties on the tonnage of ships and vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, when he should be "satisfied" that the discriminating duties of such foreign nations, "so far as they operate to the disadvantage of the United States," had been abolished.

He was allowed to suspend—in fact, to declare a repeal of—duties on importations when he found that the discriminating duties of certain foreign nations, so far as they operated to the disadvantage of the United States, had been abolished. He was to determine whether they had so far suspended their duties as to make them cease to disadvantageously affect the United States.

Touching the general question, the court said:

> That Congress can not delegate legislative power to the President is a principle universally recognized as vital to the integrity and maintenance of the system of government ordained by the Constitution. * * * The legislature can not delegate its power to make a law; but it can make a law to delegate a power to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law makes, or intends to make, its own action depend. To deny this would be to stop the wheels of government. There are many things upon which wise and useful legislation must depend which can not be known to the lawmaking power, and must, therefore, be a subject of inquiry and determination outside of the halls of legislation.

Now, I call attention to a decision by the Supreme Court of Virginia, reported in Ninetieth Virginia, 679. It there appeared that the constitution of the State under the head of "County organization," ordained that in each district "there shall be elected one supervisor, three justices of the peace, one constable," and so forth. "But nothing in this article," says the fourth section of the constitution, "shall be construed as prohibiting the general assembly from providing by law for any additional officers in any city or county."

In pursuance of this power the general assembly passed the act of 1876, to the effect that "whenever a county court shall be of opinion that the public service requires a greater number of justices or constables in any district than those specified in the constitution," it should provide for their number and election and appoint officers to serve ad interim until such additional officers could be elected. An appointment of a justice of the peace by a county court in pursuance of this power was challenged on the ground that the act delegated legislative power to the county court. This contention was held to be entirely without foundation, the court saying, page 681:

There is here no delegation of legislative power, but the county courts are merely empowered to declare the event, so to speak, upon which the act is to take effect within their respective counties.

Mr. President, I will not detain the Senate longer now. I wished to present this answer, especially with reference to the argument made some days ago by the Senator from Utah, and I hope to be able to bring the bill before the Senate again very shortly.

APPENDIX.

SUMMARY OF STATUTES CONFERRING DISCRETIONARY POWER ON THE PRESIDENT IN CERTAIN CASES.

Mexican embargo act, March 14, 1912 (37 Stat., 630), provides:

"That whenever the President shall find that in any American country conditions of domestic violence exist which are promoted by the use of arms or munitions of war procured from the United States, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export except under such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe any arms or munitions of war from any place in the United States to such country until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

SEC. 2. That any shipment of material hereby declared unlawful after such a proclamation shall be punishable by fine not exceeding $10,000, or imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both."

Pickett Act, June 25, 1910 (36 Stat., 847), provides:

"That the President may, at any time in his discretion, temporarily withdraw from settlement, location, sale, or entry any of the public lands of the United States, including the District of Alaska, and reserve the same for water-power sites, irrigation, classification of lands, or other public purposes to be specified in the orders of withdrawals, and such withdrawals or reservations shall remain in force until revoked by him or by act of Congress * * *."

Mr. ASHURST rose.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, before the Senator from Arizona asks to proceed with the Indian appropriation bill, I ask permission to have read at the Secretary's desk the minority report of Mr. VOLSTEAD upon a bill, I think, in identical terms, or in almost identical terms, with the bill which is now under consideration. The report was made at the present session of Congress, and not at the last session. It is very short, and I ask the Secretary to read it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, does the Senator want it read or put in the RECORD without reading?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is very short, and I should like to have it read; it will take but a few moments.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. VOLSTEAD submitted the following minority report:

This bill if enacted into law would be an unnecessary and unwise departure from a long-established policy. It is an attempt to evade, if not a direct violation of, the Constitution of the United States. It, in effect, gives to the President power to remove all circuit and district judges that have served 10 years and attained the age of 70 if "in his opinion public good so requires."

The Constitution provides that "the judges both of the Supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior." The office of a judge is to decide legal controversies arising within a certain district. His office is coextensive with his jurisdiction and the territory over which he presides. The office of judge of the various districts and circuits is to continue unchanged under this bill, but the functions of the judges affected, their jurisdiction, are to be exercised by new judges appointed, as the bill says, to "relieve" them. The release from duty is not optional with these judges, as it is expressly provided that the new ones shall perform their duties. The judges that are to be relieved are not to perform any of the functions of judges unless assigned thereto by some other judge, and that only in case some exigency requires an additional judge. They are to have no control over the business of the district, and when they die or retire no new judge shall be appointed to fill the vacancy. How can it be said that judges who are thus deprived of their powers do, in the language of the Constitution, "hold their offices"? It would seem idle to argue that these judges do continue to "hold their offices" because they are not entirely shorn of of power, but may for certain purposes serve as judges. If their powers can be taken from them to the extent proposed by this bill, what shall prevent taking from them all powers? The bill, in effect, provides for the removal of the judges entitled to retire and makes of them mere shadows of a judge.

That this constitutional provision is mandatory is plain from its language. Justice Story in the case of Martin v. Hunter (1 Wheaton, p. 328), speaking of this constitutional provision, uses this language:

"The judges, both of the Supreme Court and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior. * * * Could Congress create or limit any other tenure of the judicial office? * * * But one answer can be given to these questions. It must be in the negative."

This bill certainly does attempt to limit the tenure of these judges.

It is not necessary to argue that a finding by the President that the public good requires the removal of a judge does not warrant removal. Good behavior is good moral conduct. A judge may be exemplary in that respect both on the bench and in his private life, still under this bill it is in effect provided that he may be removed from his office. The framers of the Constitution sought to protect the Federal judiciary against this class of legislation. They were careful to provide but one ground for removal. They no doubt anticipated that the exigencies of party politics might make the tenure of a judge insecure if he could be removed simply because some one thought the public good might require that a judge be relieved to make place for some deserving partisan. If the President should find that a judge affected by this bill held views that in his opinion were opposed to the public interest, he might remove him and install another in his place. We have had instances in our history when the exercise of such a power would have been strenuously demanded by a large section of the public.

This legislation can not be justified upon the ground that in some districts superannuated judges have refused to retire under existing law. Many judges at the age of 70 are not only able to discharge their duties but are men of exceptional ability. In not a few instances men not entitled to retire have been physically incapacitated. If this bill is to adopt a fair policy, it should apply not only to those that may retire but to all whose removal may in the opinion of the President be for the public good.

This bill is a surrender of a long-established policy. Congress must under the Constitution provide courts. This power carries with it the duty of determining to what extent courts are necessary. In the past Congress has insisted that when a new judge is appointed that appointment should first be authorized by an act passed for that purpose. This bill is an attempt to delegate to the President the power to determine to what extent additional judges and courts are necessary. There is no good reason why a district suffering for lack of judges should not in the future, as in the past, apply to Congress for relief. The only reason that can be suggested is the difficulty in securing relief through Congress. Congress has always been liberal in providing additional judges, but before it will provide for another judge it insists upon knowing that there is some necessity for the additional expenditure that such an appointment always entails. Under this bill one judge could not be made to serve as judge in two districts, while Congress may by an act provide relief by adding one judge where two are now serving, thus saving the expenses incident to an additional judge.

Not only in this bill in contravention of the Constitution but it would adopt a vicious and dangerous policy, one that, if made effective as applied to the judges who may now retire, would no doubt in time be applied to all judges. Such a law if valid would make the judiciary absolutely dependent on the will of the Executive. It is the duty of Congress to guard the Public Treasury. This bill gives the President power to obligate the Treasury for the salary and other expenses of judges that Congress and not the President should authorize. This bill should not pass.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. On the opposite page are printed the views of Mr. GRAHAM showing that he also dissented. I ask that the Secretary read those views.

The Secretary read as follows:

VIEWS OF MR. GRAHAM.

I do not approve of the policy in this bill, and doubt its constitutionality.

GEORGE S. GRAHAM.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I ask that the report of the majority of the House committee may also be printed in the RECORD. I do not care to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, such will be the order.

The report referred to is as follows:

Mr. CARAWAY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report, to accompany H. R. 61:

The Committee on the Judiciary, having had under consideration a bill (H. R. 61) to amend section 260 of the Judicial Code, report the same to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

A bill proposing similiar legislation was before the Sixty-third Congress, with the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on the Judiciary of that Congress. It was, however, never taken up and acted upon.

Mr. Attorney General James C. McReynolds, now Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, in his report, dated December 1, 1913, makes the following recommendation:

"Judges of United States courts, at the age of 70, after having served 10 years, may retire upon full pay. In the past many judges have availed themselves of this privilege. Some, however, have remained upon the bench long beyond the time when they were capable of adequately discharging their duties, and in consequence the administration of justice has suffered. The power of Congress to correct this condition is limited by the provision of the Constitution that judges shall hold their offices during good behavior. I suggest an act providing when any judge of a Federal court below the Supreme Court fails to avail himself of the privilege of retiring now granted by law, that the President be required, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint another judge, who shall preside over the affairs of the court and have precedence over the older one. This will insure at all times the presence of a judge sufficiently active to discharge promptly and adequately the duties of the court."

Mr. Attorney General Gregory renewed these recommendations in his report dated December 7, 1914. He again renewed these recommendations in his report dated December 6, 1915, with the modification that while in the former recommendation it was provided that the President be "required" to appoint, with the advice and consent of the Senate, another judge, etc., in the last report it is recommended that he "be authorized," with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint, etc.

The bill carries out the provisions of the recommendation, with the exception that it provides that the President, "if in his opinion the public good so requires, may appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an additional circuit judge," etc., and repeats the same language with regard to the right to appoint an additional district judge.

The bill as thus drawn does not require the President to appoint such additional judge in all cases where the judge has held his commission for 10 years and reached the age of 70, but empowers him to do so only when he finds that the public good requires it.

Some of the circuit and district judges are still vigorous at the age of 70 and do the work of their office. In such a case the President would not find that the public good required the additional judge. If, however, he is not so vigorous at this age, he is still permitted by this bill to remain in office, but be relieved from the weight of the work that is required by the office. Under the present law such a judge is allowed to retire on full pay. The bill is designed to cure the evil spoken of in the reports of the Attorney General where such judge does not retire and is too old and infirm to do the work required for the proper administration of justice.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senate that I have consumed as much of the time from the Indian appropriation bill as I think I can justly do in deference to the wishes of the committee in charge of that bill; but at the first opportunity I shall reply to that part of the report of the minority of the House committee in which is questioned the constitutional right of Congress to classify the work of these judges and to give to the old judges only the work which this bill leaves to them. The answer is not difficult. The constitutionality of the proposed legislation is clear. For the present I am content to cite the opinions of two Attorneys General on the subject—Mr. Justice McReynolds in 1913, when he was Attorney General, and the present Attorney General in his last two reports—both of whom recommend this legislation; and certainly they would not recommend it unless they were sure it was constitutional. I will also add that this bill was prepared with the aid of the present able Solicitor General of the United States, who cordially approves it.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10385) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment is at the top of page 13, line 1, after the word "crops," to strike out "$300,000" and insert "$400,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I renew the inquiry which I was making yesterday afternoon when the Senate went into executive session with respect to the cattle to be purchased for the Indians?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs advertises for the number of cattle desired for each reservation, giving the age and a description of the animals required. In the notice the breed of cattle desired is given, and the regulations reserve to the department the right to accept or reject any bids. The cattle must come up to the specifications, and are subject to examination, and if they fail to come up to the requirements the department refuses to accept the cattle.

I will say to the Senator from New York that during the last year or two the cattle purchased have been young animals. I think his question was brought about by a report that the department was buying old cattle. It is true that one purchase was made of old cattle, and the department, I guess, was greatly imposed upon by that purchase, but the assistant commissioner assured the committee that that was being watched, and that now only the desirable breeds or grades would be purchased.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, in addition to what the distinguished Senator from Kansas has said, and in specific reply to the request for information propounded by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], I will state that immediately upon the adjournment of this body last evening I telephoned to the department. I find that the data which the Senator requires is quite voluminous, but it will be ready and available to-morrow, giving in detail the number purchased since July 1, 1913, the grade, the breed, the average price per head, the sex, and all other information.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I had not intended to impose such a burden upon the department. It is true that sometime ago rumors did reach me as to the age of the cattle and the quality of the cattle, which, in a few instances only, have been purchased for the Indians; and it occurred to me, when this item in the appropriation bill was reached, that the amount was so large that it would be well for the Senate to understand thoroughly just what the policy of the Government was with respect to supplying the Indians with cattle of the proper kind and type.

Personally, I am very glad, indeed, to hear of the precautions which have been taken by the department, as described by the Senator from Kansas, to prevent the Indians becoming possessed of cattle which, in the long run, they can not make any money out of; and I am glad to know that precautions are now being taken to assure the Indians of the proper kind of treatment in that respect.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the amendment, on page 8 of the bill, was not agreed to on yesterday, for the reason that a request was made that it go over. I think it is desirable to perfect the bill, as far as possible, as we go along. I will say to the Senate that I have here an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will return to page 8, and the Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the proviso printed in the bill on page 8, beginning with line 16, it is proposed to insert:

Provided further, That no money appropriated herein shall be expended on or after January 1, 1917, for the employment of any farmer or expert farmer at a salary in excess of $50 per month, unless he shall first have procured and filed with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs a certificate of competency showing that he is a farmer of actual experience and qualified to instruct others in the art of practical agriculture, such certificate to be certified and issued to him by the president or dean of the State agricultural college of the State in which his services are to be rendered, or by the president or dean of the State agricultural college of an adjoining State: Provided, That this provision shall not apply to persons now employed in the Indian Service as farmer or expert farmer: And provided further, That this shall not apply to Indians employed or to be employed as assistant farmer.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I believe it was the unanimous opinion of the committee that the Indian Office should be given authority to go outside of the civil service to secure expert farmers when it was impossible for them to secure them under the existing law. This amendment simply provides that the department may be permitted to select experienced men to instruct Indians in the art of agriculture. The majority of the committee have agreed to substitute the words "assistant farmer" in place of "farmer or expert farmer." I do not believe we should exempt Indians from taking civil-service examinations if they are to be permitted to act as expert farmers.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I observe that the Senator, in his proposed amendment, has eliminated the phrase "when practicable," which leaves the Indian Office some latitude. Does the Senator think it is wise to make a hard and fast rule in a matter of that kind?

Mr. GRONNA. I believe it is wise to eliminate those words, Mr. President. I think the Congress should say definitely what the bureau should do. It will give the department or the bureau an opportunity to select new men, if they are needed, without any criticism, because it is the mandate of the law. It says they shall do it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is the Senator from North Dakota quite sure that it will always be possible to comply with the provision? Will it always be possible, upon all of these Indian lands, to secure farmers who answer to this description?

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that the committee has given that very question a great deal of study, and I think it is almost the unanimous opinion that they can be had, because we have our agricultural colleges in every State of the Union.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from North Dakota to the use of the language "at a salary in excess of $50." I suppose he intended to say, "at a salary of or in excess of $50."

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; "at a salary of or in excess of."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota accepts the suggestion of the Senator from Oklahoma. The Secretary will insert, after the word "salary," the words "of or," so that it will read "at a salary of or in excess of $50 per month."

The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota to substitute the amendment tendered by him for the amendment offered by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the adoption of the amendment offered by the committee, for which the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota has been substituted.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 9, to strike out:

That the lands, buildings, fixtures, and all property rights granted to the State of Colorado for educational purposes by section 5 of the act of Congress approved April 4, 1910 (36 Stat. L., p. 273), may, in lieu of the use designated in said grant, be utilized by said State for the care of the insane, as an agricultural experiment station, or for such other public purposes as may be authorized by the legislature of the State: Provided, That Indians shall always be admitted to such institutions free of charge and upon an equality with white persons.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I move, if that is the proper procedure, that the language of the House bill stricken out by the Senate committee be restored.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will come on the adoption of the committee amendment. If the amendment is not adopted, the language of the House bill will be restored.

Mr. THOMAS. This is a committee amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is true; and the question before the Senate is whether or not the committee amendment shall be adopted. If that is voted down, automatically the language of the House bill will be restored.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield to me for a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to say that since this bill has been reported I have given more careful consideration and investigation to this amendment made by the committee, and I do not agree to it at this time. I think it is an unwise amendment. I hope it will be defeated.

Mr. OWEN. Where is it?

Mr. ASHURST. On page 14, lines 10 to 20.

Mr. THOMAS. I understand that the chairman of the committee, then, is willing to accept my amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. This is simply a motion to strike out. It is not a motion to strike out and insert, but simply to strike out.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; that is true.

Mr. LODGE. Then, of course, by merely rejecting the amendment of the committee the object of the Senator from Colorado will be accomplished.

Mr. THOMAS. I thank the Senator for the suggestion. The object I wish to accomplish is the main thing, and I think the Senator's suggestion is much better than my own.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Arizona why, in his opinion, the provision in the House bill is preferable to the provision adopted by the committee of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. There is not any language proposed by the committee of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; there is.

Mr. LODGE. The House provision is just stricken out.

Mr. ASHURST. On April 4, 1910, the property at Grand Junction, Colo., was granted to that State for the use of its citizens, including Indians, to be maintained by the State of Colorado as a school. The State now wishes to utilize the property as an asylum. This was agreed to by the House. It will be observed that it is provided that Indians shall be admitted to such institution free of charge and upon an equality with whites. Upon reflection it seems to me it is a wise piece of legislation.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. If I may be permitted, I do not understand that the committee proposes, as it stands on the face of the bill, to insert anything. The committee simply proposes to strike out.

Mr. ASHURST. That is it, and not to insert—just to strike out. Nothing is substituted.

Mr. SMOOT. In reading the provision that follows, Mr. President, I thought it was a substitute for the language in the House bill, but I see it is another matter entirely. So it is a question of agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, with the indulgence of the Senate, I will give a short history of the school or property which is involved in this section of the bill.

The United States for some years maintained and operated two Indian schools—one at Grand Junction, which bore the name of Colorado's distinguished Senator of many years' standing, Senator Teller. That school was for many years well attended, and was one of the most efficient and well-equipped Indian schools in the country. The Government also maintained a smaller school in the southwestern part of the State, known as the Fort Lewis School, the school consisting of structures which at one time had been used for a small military post in the extreme southwestern portion of the State. The Indian titles to practically all the lands of the State have been extinguished or else allotted to Indian tribes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have made a hurried canvass of this side of the Chamber, and we are now unanimous in favor of the proposition of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I am very grateful to the Senator for interrupting me. I assumed, from the question asked by the Senator from Utah of the Senator in charge of the bill, that he desired some explanation concerning the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 20, to insert:

That section 2 of the act approved March 2, 1907 (34 Stat. L., 1221), entitled "An act providing for the allotment and distribution of Indian tribal funds," be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"That the pro rata share of any Indian who is mentally or physically incapable of managing his or her own affairs may be withdrawn from the Treasury, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, and expended for the benefit of such Indian under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the said Secretary may prescribe:" Provided, That said funds of any Indian shall not be withdrawn from the Treasury until needed by the Indian and upon his application and when approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, what is the effect of that amendment?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, this was deemed by the committee and by the Indian Bureau to be a very important item of legislation.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to it. I only wanted to know what the effect was.

Mr. ASHURST. I was going to explain in just a moment.

Under the existing law there is a certain class of able-bodied but noncompetent Indians who can not withdraw their share of the tribal funds from the Treasury. This is to enable those Indians who are able-bodied but noncompetent—and the use of the word "noncompetent" in Indian laws and treaties refers to their inability to handle their own funds—to use those funds, or to enable the Secretary to use them for them, for their industrial betterment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, what is added? The proviso?

Mr. ASHURST. No; commencing on line 21, page 14, running to and including line 11, on page 15.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; if the Senator will pardon me, the amendment begins at line 3, on page 15.

Mr. ASHURST. I beg the Senator's pardon; it begins on line 21, page 14.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is the introductory part of it. That tells us that you are going to amend it. You say it is "amended so as to read as follows." Then follows, beginning on line 3, page 15, the proposed amendment.

Let me ask the Senator from Arizona this question: The substantive part of the provision is:

That the pro rata share of any Indian who is mentally or physically incapable of managing his or her own affairs may be withdrawn from the Treasury in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior and expended for the benefit of such Indian—

And so forth.

The proviso is—

That said funds of any Indian shall not be withdrawn from the Treasury until needed by the Indian and upon his application.

If the Indian is mentally incapable of managing his own affairs, it seems to me an anomaly to require that he must make an application. He may be utterly incapable of making the application.

Mr. ASHURST. I see the ambiguity; but this amendment says, "any Indian who is mentally or physically incapable."

Mr. SMOOT. That magnifies it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Of course, if he is physically incapable he can make the application, but if he is mentally incapable, it seems to me rather strange to require him to make an application.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, they never become so insane or mentally incapable but that they can tell you when they are hungry or cold, and that is what that was for.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Why provide for the utterly useless formality on the part of an insane Indian of making an application to withdraw money?

Mr. LANE. It is a request. The Indian can apply for help, as any other hungry man would. He can go and say that he is hungry or that he is cold. That is all this is for.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Of course, if everybody is satisfied with that sort of a provision, I suppose I should not object to it.

Mr. LANE. If he has not sense enough to do that, he ought to starve.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will ask the Senator from Oregon how the application is made. Does he fill out a written blank?

Mr. LANE. No; he applies in person. Most of the Indians are unable to write the English language; at least, the old full bloods are.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. How is he to apply to the Secretary of the Interior in person—an insane Indian off on a reservation?

Mr. LANE. He applies to the superintendent.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is certainly an anomaly.

Mr. LANE. And then it has to be approved. I think all these applications have to be finally approved by the Secretary.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It occurs to me that the proviso is not only somewhat nonsensical, but that it is absolutely unnecessary. The substantive provision is that the pro rata share of the Indian so incapacitated may be withdrawn from the Treasury, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, and expended for his benefit. Why is not that enough?

Mr. ASHURST. That is all right. There is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. LANE. I think, Mr. President, the reason this proviso is placed in here is that under the general rule of the Bureau of Indian Affairs a majority of the full-blooded Indians are held to be incompetent and incapable of attending to their own affairs, and they are managed as a trust by the superintendent, under the supervision of the commissioner, who acts under the Secretary of the Interior. So there are thousands of them who are incompetent under the law as the law in relation to the Indians is now construed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But, Mr. President, an insane Indian going through this performance would not know whether he was making an application for funds or writing a valentine. He would not have any idea what he was doing.

Mr. LANE. It does not say "insane"; it says "mentally incapable." For lack of experience in business these Indians are held to be mentally incapable, or, as they term it, "incompetent," as I understand, if the Senator please.

Mr. LODGE. It certainly does not mean "insane."

Mr. LANE. It does not mean "insane." Insane Indians are provided for otherwise; but under the ruling—perhaps not under the law—they are held to be incapable and incompetent; and some of those Indians become old and blind and helpless, and they become hungry and cold, and this is to provide for their actual necessities.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the old law limited the authority of the Secretary to help Indians who were blind, crippled, or helpless from old age, disease, or accident. This amendment was submitted in order to permit the Secretary to relieve those who were mentally and physically incapable of managing their own affairs. The application is required more to keep track of the accounts than for anything else.

There is no large number of insane Indians, only about 93 or 94. Most of those are in an asylum, and their funds are looked after in another way. By requiring an application the department can trace the funds to the local office and on up to the Indian Office; and then they know that the money has been paid out at the request of the party entitled to it and who perhaps has no relative able to take care of him. The provision was recommended by the department, and the committee thought it was a very reasonable one, because they thought it would enable them to keep track of the funds.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. Also, on page 15, beginning on line 12, the committee proposes the following amendment——

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, that is a provision which is so far-reaching and searching that I do not think any member of the committee knows to what extent it will go. Inasmuch as it is legislation——

Mr. LODGE and Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert the following:

That section 5 of the act approved June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. L., p. 857), be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read:

"That it shall be unlawful for any person to induce any Indian to execute any contract, deed, mortgage, lease, or other instrument touching land held under a trust or other patent containing restrictions on alienation, or to procure the execution by any Indian of any such instrument, or to be a party with any Indian to any such contract, deed, mortgage, lease, or other instrument, or to offer any such contract, deed, mortgage, lease, or other instrument as aforesaid for record; and any person violating this provision shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 for the first offense, and if convicted for a second offense may be punished by a fine not exceeding $500, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any contract, deed, mortgage, lease, or other instrument authorized by law to be made. Any Indian or his heirs in the possession of any live stock, their increase, or any other personal property issued by the United States or purchased with trust funds and held in trust by the United States, may lawfully sell, transfer, mortgage, or otherwise dispose of such property only with the consent in writing of the United States Indian agent or superintendent having jurisdiction over such property and not otherwise. Any person who shall induce any Indian to sell, transfer, mortgage, or otherwise dispose of, or shall procure the sale, transfer, mortgage, or other disposal by any Indian, or shall be a party with any Indian to the sale, transfer, mortgage, or other disposal of any such personal property in violation of the foregoing provision, or who shall knowingly offer for record any instrument evidencing any prohibited or unlawful sale, transfer, mortgage, or other disposal of any such personal property, or who shall knowingly take or receive possession of any such personal property in pursuance to any such prohibited or unlawful sale, transfer, mortgage, or other transaction, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall upon conviction be punished by a fine not exceeding $500, or imprisoned not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment. Any sale, transfer, mortgage, or other disposal in violation of this provision, of any property so issued and held shall be absolutely void, and title to the property involved in such void transaction shall revert to the United States, and the property may be taken possession of by the United States Indian agent or superintendent having jurisdiction over the property. Any Indian or other person having tribal rights who shall induce any person to enter into any such contract, deed, mortgage, lease, sale, transfer, or other agreement or transaction prohibited and declared to be unlawful by the above provisions, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall upon conviction be punished by a fine not exceeding $500, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment: Provided further, That any United States Indian agent, superintendent, or employee that shall in any manner connive or conspire to secure, or assist in securing, the making of such prohibited contract shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or shall be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to ask the Senator from Arizona a question about this proposed amendment. As I understand it, it makes it unlawful for any person to induce an Indian to execute any contract, deed, mortgage, lease, or other instrument touching land, and so forth, and on page 17 I find this provision:

Any sale, transfer, mortgage, or other disposal in violation of this provision of any property so issued and held shall be absolutely void, and title to the property involved in such void transaction shall revert to the United States.

So it would seem that an Indian who has been imposed upon perhaps by inducing him to execute one of these papers is punished by taking from him the property involved in the transaction. Is it the purpose of the committee to impose any such condition as that?

Mr. ASHURST. It was not the purpose of the committee to do that. The committee simply adopted the language furnished by the Interior Department.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is not that what it does?

Mr. ASHURST. I do not think that it warrants or merits that construction. That is only my opinion.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think——

Mr. ASHURST. My opinion of the proposed law is that it simply extends the same provisions of the law as now applied to real estate to personal property. Whether appropriate language is or is not used may be a question, but that is the intent of the proposed amendment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator interprets it, then, as meaning that the property shall revert to the United States to be held for the benefit of the Indians in the same way as it was before.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me get an answer to my question. Is that the purpose?

Mr. ASHURST. My interpretation of the proposed statute is that the department and the members of the committee who favored this legislation intended that it might have the effect of making void any sale or purchase from an Indian of his property where undue advantage was taken of him.

Mr. SMOOT. May I suggest to my colleague that, if this proposed amendment is adopted, I do not think there will ever be any transfer deed or lease or anything else to a white man? It seems to me that a white man could never speak to an Indian—unless perhaps it was somebody in the department—hereafter if this proposed amendment is adopted.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will yield to me for the purpose, I want to make a point of order against this proposed amendment that it is an attempt to introduce general legislation upon a general appropriation bill. I think it is extremely bad legislation and will have precisely the effect which the senior Senator from Utah suggested.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LANE. I should like to suggest to the Senator that there is on page 16 a clause, beginning at line 7 and ending at line 13, wherein the Indian is forbidden to sell stock which has been issued to him in trust unless on this reimbursable plan or revolving fund.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the existing statutes are ample for the protection of the Indians.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LANE. There is another provision here I think the Senator might allow—

Provided further, That any United States Indian agent, superintendent, or employee that shall in any manner connive or conspire to secure, or assist in securing, the making of such prohibited contracts shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor—

And so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is still sustained.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, after line 23, to insert:

For reimbursing Indians for live stock which has been heretofore or which may be hereafter destroyed on account of being infected with dourine or other contagious diseases, and for expenses in connection with the work of eradicating and preventing such diseases, to be expended under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, $100,000, said amount to be immediately available and to remain available until expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, after line 6, to insert:

For the payment to Charles J. Kappler for the work of compiling, annotating, and indexing the third volume of Indian Laws and Treaties, the sum of $2,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this seems to be a private claim on an appropriation bill, which is in conflict with our rules. I should like to ask what the facts are in connection with this item?

Mr. ASHURST. I will be very glad to supply the Senator with the information. On May 20, 1902, the following resolution was passed by the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs is hereby authorized to have printed for the use of the Senate a compilation of all treaties, laws, and executive orders now in force relating to Indian affairs.

Under the resolution of May 20, 1902, there was compiled a volume of Indian laws, with suitable index, consisting in all of 1,162 pages; there was also compiled one volume of treaties with the Indian tribes, with suitable index, comprising in all 1,099 pages. That was paid for.

Later, under the resolution of March 3, 1911, there was compiled one volume of laws and treaties, with suitable index, consisting in all of 798 pages.

The Senate accepted the work Mr. Kappler performed. I think he was once clerk of the committee; I am not certain. It was long before I came here. It is a very substantial and a very useful publication, and the committee feels that since having taken the benefit and the fruits of this man's labor, nothing is more just than that we should pay him for it. The claim was $3,000, and the committee approved it at $2,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. How large a volume is it?

Mr. ASHURST. The last volume is 798 pages, and it is technical work. I will state further, it is not generally known that from 1778 to 1871 treaties were made by the United States with the Indian tribes, and that by the act of March 3, 1871 (16 Stats., 566; "Laws," 8), Congress provided—

That hereafter no Indian nation or tribe within the territory of the United States shall be acknowledged or recognized as an independent nation, tribe, or power with whom the United States may contract by treaty.

Since 1871 the United States have entered into agreements with the Indian tribes, which agreements must pass both Houses of Congress and be signed by the President; whereupon they become laws. In consequence a division of treaties and agreements is made in the compilation by arranging the former in the volume entitled "Treaties," and the latter in the volume entitled "Laws."

This gentleman compiled all the treaties and laws, and the Committee on Indian Affairs has recourse to the work frequently.

Mr. GALLINGER. This occurred during the time when the able Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] was chairman of the committee, and I find that the Senator from Minnesota feels that this sum is justly due this man. Of course it could be stricken from the bill on a point of order, but it is a small matter, and I have nothing further to say about it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not going to make a point of order against the claim. When the request was made of the Senate to print this document it was granted, and I remember stating at that time that more than likely a claim would be submitted for the compilation. Nothing was said as to whether there would or would not be. Of course, we know the work was done by Mr. Kappler, and he was very anxious indeed that it be printed and that the Government pay the expense. The Government did pay the expense of printing the volume. Of course, there is not any question but that Mr. Kappler did the work. Whether it was done for the purpose of drawing this salary or for the use of Mr. Kappler in his future work I am not able to say; but, as the chairman of the committee stated, it ought to be paid, and I shall make no objection to the amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to read——

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I should like to correct an evident misunderstanding. Reference was made by the chairman to the fact that Mr. Kappler was at one time secretary of the committee. I know the observation left in the minds of some the thought that while he was secretary or clerk he did this work. It was done long after he had ceased any connection whatever with the committee.

Mr. ASHURST. I should have stated that. That is the fact.

Mr. SMOOT. I know that is the fact, and I know that Mr. Kappler was very much interested in following the laws affecting the Indians of this country. I think that was one of the reasons and perhaps the basic reason why he undertook to compile the laws and then requested Congress to have the compilation printed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I want to express my gratification that the Indian appropriation bills are being made better and better year by year. I have run through this bill hurriedly, and I believe this is the only claim that is in it.

Mr. ASHURST. There is just one other, a claim of $20.

Mr. GALLINGER. We have passed that. That is in the House text.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is refreshing, because there has been a tendency in past years to get claims allowed on appropriation bills. It is a very bad practice. Our rules prohibit it. The fact that this seems to be the only claim the Senate committee at least has placed in the bill is an added reason why I certainly shall not object to the amendment. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] tells me there is just one other. That is not bad, if there are only two.

Mr. CLAPP. In this connection I wish to say that, due very largely to the efforts of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and former Senator Hale, of Maine, the practice to which the Senator from New Hampshire referred, which had grown here beyond all proportion, was corrected. Through their efforts the committee was able at one time to take hold of the matter and change the policy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, after line 9, to insert:

Section 9 of the act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stats. L., p. 450), is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"That hereafter all bidders under any advertisement published by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for proposals for goods, supplies, transportation, etc., for and on account of the Indian Service, whenever the value of the goods, supplies, etc., to be furnished, or the transportation to be performed, shall exceed the sum of $5,000, shall accompany their bids with a certified check, draft, or cashier's check, payable to the order of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, upon some United States depository or some one of such solvent national banks as the Secretary of the Interior may designate, or by an acceptable bond in favor of the United States, which check, draft, or bond shall be for 5 per cent of the amount of the goods, supplies, transportation, etc., as aforesaid; and in case any such bidder, on being awarded a contract, shall fail to execute the same with good and sufficient sureties according to the terms on which such bid was made and accepted, such bidder, or the sureties on his bond, shall forfeit the amount so deposited or guaranteed to the United States, and the same shall forthwith be paid into the Treasury of the United States; but if such contract shall be duly executed, as aforesaid, such draft, check, or bond so deposited shall be returned to the bidder."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, after line 10, to insert:

That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is hereby authorized to investigate claims and negotiate agreements with any tribe or bands of Indians for the final adjudication and settlement of all claims and demands of such tribes or bands against the United States arising under any law, treaty, or agreement, and which have not heretofore been adjudicated; and the Secretary of the Interior shall report the result of such negotiations to Congress for its approval at the earliest practicable date, and there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000 for all expenses in connection with this work, including pay of necessary additional employees.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. I should like to have that amendment passed over.

Mr. LANE. I raise a point of order against it.

Mr. STERLING. My colleague has introduced a bill authorizing the Sioux Tribe of Indians to submit their claims to the Court of Claims, and I should like to study this amendment a little in connection with that proposed measure.

Mr. LANE. I raise the point of order that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

The next amendment was, on page 19, line 23, to insert the heading "Arizona and New Mexico."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Arizona and New Mexico," in section 2, on page 20, line 9, after "$12,500," to strike out "in all, $131,900" and insert "for the purchase of land adjacent to the school property, $3,500; in all, $135,400," so as to make the clause read:

For support and education of 700 Indian pupils at the Indian school at Phoenix, Ariz., and for pay of superintendent, $119,400; for general repairs and improvements, $12,500; for the purchase of land adjacent to the school property, $3,500; in all, $135,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 14, page 20, the last paragraph read being the following:

For support and education of 100 pupils at the Indian school at Truxton Canyon, Ariz., and for pay of superintendent, $18,200; for general repairs and improvements, $3,000; in all, $21,200.

Mr. LODGE. I think in line 20 the name "Truxton" is wrongly spelled, and it ought to be "T-r-u-x-t-u-n." I do not know whether it is a misprint, but certainly that is the name of old Commodore Truxtun, from whom I think the name was undoubtedly taken.

Mr. ASHURST. I think the Senator is correct about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The correction in the spelling will be made.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 19, after the date "1905," to strike out "$10,000" and insert "$15,000," and in line 21, after the words "in all," to strike out "$20,000" and insert "$25,000," so as to make the clause read:

For continuing the work of constructing the irrigation system for the irrigation of the lands of the Pima Indians in the vicinity of Sacaton, on the Gila River Indian Reservation, within the limit of cost fixed by the act of March 3, 1905, $15,000; and for maintenance and operation of the pumping plants and canal systems, $10,000; in all, $25,000, reimbursable as provided in section 2 of the act of August 24, 1912 (37 Stat. L., p. 522), and to remain available until expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, after line 17, to insert:

For enlarging the irrigation system for the irrigation of Indian lands, for protective works to prevent damage to irrigable lands by floods, and for development of domestic water supply on the Papago Indian Reservation, in Arizona, in accordance with the plans and specifications submitted by the chief engineer of the Indian Service and approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, $70,000, to remain available until expended: Provided, That the cost of said project shall be reimbursed to the United States in accordance with such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

Mr. CURTIS. I move to amend the committee amendment by striking out, beginning with the word "Provided," down to and including the word "prescribed," in line 3, page 22. This is to strike out the reimbursable feature. There are only about 700 Papago Indians. They have only 69,000 acres of land. They have no means at all, and to make it reimbursable is providing for something that will not come back. I do hope that the proviso will be stricken out.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I do not quite know why the Senator from Kansas has proposed this amendment to the amendment. I remember we had some discussion about this appropriation of $70,000, and I remember I asked the assistant commissioner if the Papago Indians were able to reimburse and if we might properly ask them to reimburse. He said they were, and upon the strength of that assurance I was willing to vote for the appropriation of $70,000. I am not certain that we ought to vote that appropriation unless it is reimbursable.

Mr. CURTIS. What the Senator from Vermont says is true. He asked the question if they could reimburse the Government. But after the committee adjourned I took pains to examine the report. I find the Indians have only 69,000 acres of land. There are 700 Indians. They have no money in the Treasury whatever. It seems to me it would be unfair to this tribe that has been self-supporting and never has called upon the Government to aid in its support to require them to pay back the $70,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. May I ask the Senator if these Indians have no surplus lands at all?

Mr. CURTIS. They have no surplus lands. They have a reservation of 69,000 acres, and only that which is irrigated will produce crops. The other is pasture. They have some stock—sheep, cattle, and horses. They have no surplus lands to sell.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What they have they need?

Mr. CURTIS. They do, for pasture.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. None could be sold without detriment?

Mr. CURTIS. Not without detriment to the tribe.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Kansas if he has satisfied himself that the amount named in this amendment is necessary? Might it be somewhat reduced?

Mr. CURTIS. The assistant commissioner advised me that it is necessary. They have to buy the right from a company who will sell to other people if they do not buy for the Indians. The idea is to let the Indians irrigate 10 acres each.

Mr. GALLINGER. Inasmuch as the white men are not very prompt in paying back what they owe to the Government on these reclamation projects, I think we ought to be pretty liberal with the Indians.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. PAGE. In referring to the hearings on page 47 I find this statement made:

Senator PAGE. We have spent, Senator CURTIS, nearly a quarter of a million dollars in constructing that system.

Is that the system to which this amendment refers?

Mr. CURTIS. That is an entirely different proposition. This relates to the Papagos.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to say, Mr. President, that I have come to the conclusion that this is a much better Indian appropriation bill than we have usually passed, and I do not want to interpose an objection where it is not absolutely right that I do it. But I am rather disinclined to approve of an amendment that comes at this late hour, because we have authorized this appropriation upon the statement of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or rather the assistant commissioner who represented him, upon the assurance that it was not a gratuity appropriation, but rather a reimbursable appropriation.

It seems to me that the appropriation of $70,000 for an irrigation system ought to have been very carefully thought out and discussed by the committee, so that we may know whether we do it right or wrong, and not on the passage through the Senate, without any discussion or any knowledge as to whether we ought or ought not to do it, transfer it from the reimbursable fund to an appropriation direct from the United States Treasury. I am free to say, Mr. President, I do not know that I am right about this matter.

I will simply say that the principle of passing an appropriation of this amount, especially for an irrigation project, and those irrigation projects are about the worst of any projects we have to deal with in the Committee on Indian Affairs, with the expectation and the claim on the part of the commissioner that it is to be reimbursable and then on the floor of the Senate striking out the reimbursable feature, seems to me to be wrong.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I unintentionally, I think, committed an act of discourtesy. I did not hear the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], and I ask to be allowed to withdraw my point of order against the item on page 19, beginning at line 11, in order to allow the Senator such time as he wishes to take, but I reserve the right to raise the point of order later.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair sustained the point of order.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I think the provision on page 19 has been misunderstood. The impression has prevailed that it conferred upon the department authority to finally and definitely settle the claims of Indian tribes. It only confers on the department authority to make tentative settlements, which must, in turn, be submitted to Congress. I believe it would save the Indians large sums of money. I also believe that the department can now sit down and make a proposition to the Indian tribes to be the subject of approval, but the department does not take that view of it and thinks it should have this authority. I can not but feel that a mistake was made in making the point of order. While some of these contracts will not be approved, some of them will, and it will save the Indians the expense of litigation.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, in this connection I simply wish to say that I was not insisting upon the amendment itself. I simply asked that it should go over for the present.

Mr. CLAPP. I know.

Mr. STERLING. I think the Senator from Oregon did not understand the request when he first made the point of order. I stated at the time, however, that I wished to consider the amendment in connection with a bill that had been introduced by my colleague [Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota], submitting the claims of Indians to the Court of Claims.

Mr. CLAPP. I think it would in many cases save the Indians a great deal of expense.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I will say that I have not any great confidence in it, but, out of courtesy to the Senator, I should like him to have time to look it over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair himself can not change his opinion on request by unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. The point of order has been made and sustained.

Mr. SMOOT. The point of order has been made and sustained. I do not see how it possibly can be withdrawn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. When a point of order has been sustained, as in Committee of the Whole, the question can not be again raised in the Senate, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, may I be permitted to say a word in connection with the ruling of the Chair concerning the point of order raised by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] and sustained, relating to that part of the Indian appropriation bill giving the Commissioner of Indian Affairs power to investigate and negotiate all Indian claims for final adjudication? I had intended to raise a point of order on this, and if that had failed I intended to move to amend the bill by striking out this paragraph, as I was unalterably opposed to it.

I had, however, discussed this matter to-day with my colleague [Mr. STERLING], and we had concluded, so far as we were concerned, to allow the matter to pass, so that he might fully investigate the subject before to-morrow. The Senator from Oregon raised the question, however, and my only object in speaking of this is that my colleague may understand that it came up to-day without any knowledge on my part.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before we pass to the next committee amendment, in the item on page 22, beginning in line 14 and ending on line 18, I ask the Senator having the bill in charge if the words "and to remain available until expended" should not be stricken from the bill? That is bad legislation, Mr. President.

Mr. ASHURST. I cheerfully admit the truth of that statement. I have no objection to that language being stricken out.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the words, on page 22, beginning in line 16, "and to remain available until expended" be stricken from the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the chairman of the committee accept the amendment?

Mr. ASHURST. I move the amendment which has been suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 22, in lines 16 and 17, it is proposed to strike out the words "and to remain available until expended."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 22, after line 18, to insert:

For the construction, by the Indian Service, of a dam with a bridge superstructure and the necessary controlling works for diverting water from the Gila River for the irrigation of Indian land and Indian allotments on the Gila River Indian Reservation, Ariz., as recommended by the Board of Engineers of the United States Army in paragraph 217 of its report to the Secretary of War of February 14, 1914 (H. Doc. No. 791), $200,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended, reimbursable as provided in section 2 of the act of August 24, 1912 (37 Stat. L., 522).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, after line 20, to insert:

For beginning the construction by the Indian Service of a dam and the necessary canals and other irrigation works, and the purchase of rights of way and other property rights, and doing all things necessary for beginning the carrying out of a project to irrigate Indian lands on the Gila River Indian Reservation and private and public lands in Pinal County, Ariz., said dam to be built at a site above Florence, Ariz., $175,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended: Provided, That the water diverted from the Gila River by said dam shall be distributed by the Secretary of the Interior to the Indian lands of said reservation and to the private and public lands in said county in accordance with the respective rights and priorities of such lands to the beneficial use of said water as may be determined by agreement of the owners thereof with the Secretary of the Interior or by a court of competent jurisdiction: Provided further, That the construction charge for the actual cost of said dam and other works and rights shall be divided equitably by the Secretary of the Interior between the Indian lands and the private and public lands in said project; and said cost as fixed for said Indian lands shall be reimbursable as provided in section 2 of the act of August 24, 1912 (37 Stat. L., 522); but the construction charge as fixed for the private and public lands in said county shall be paid by the owner or entryman in accordance with the terms of an act extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, approved August 13, 1914 (38 Stat. L., 686): And provided further, That said project shall only be undertaken if the Secretary of the Interior shall be able to make or provide for what he shall deem to be satisfactory adjustments of the rights to the water to be diverted by said dam or carried in said canals, and satisfactory arrangements for the inclusion of lands within said project and the purchase of property rights which he shall deem necessary to be acquired, and shall determine and declare said project to be feasible.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I make the point of order that this amendment is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is overruled. The provision has to do exclusively with one piece of work and is therefore not general legislation either with reference to the construction of dams or with reference to the Indians in general.

Mr. CURTIS. The amendment also provides for irrigation for white settlers, and not Indians.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is aware of that.

Mr. ASHURST. Will my friend from Kansas yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has ruled on the question. The Senator from Kansas may appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CURTIS. I have no desire to appeal from the decision of the Chair, but I thought perhaps the Chair misunderstood the amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. I want to say that this expenditure is estimated for; it was in the Indian appropriation bill of last year, and it was agreed to by the Senate in almost these terms, but the bill at that time, unfortunately, failed. This item has been recommended both in the estimates and by a special letter to the chairmen of the Committees on Indian Affairs of the Senate and of the other House.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will be disagreed to. I remember looking up this question a number of years ago. It was then a question before the other House. Two facts appeared upon the investigation. In the first place, these Indians had been self-supporting until the Government granted a right to build a dam and to allow the taking of certain water rights by an irrigation company, with the understanding that the Indians would be supplied with water. They were not supplied with water, and they became charges upon the Government, and from that time on this Government has had to appropriate to assist in their support every year.

I stated to the chairman of the committee when this measure was pending before the committee that I should oppose it unless some provision was made which would guarantee the protection of those Indians in their water rights. I find nothing of the kind in this proposed amendment.

I am opposed to this legislation for another reason. In an investigation at the time to which I refer I carefully studied the geological reports, and I found that a dam constructed at or about the place named in the amendment would fill up in 10 years with the silt that came down the river during the awful floods, and that it would cost at least a million dollars to build such a dam; another dam in a new location would be required.

I think, Senators, if you will study the result of these irrigation projects upon the Treasury and the small benefits that have gone to the Indians you will not engage in any new irrigation projects, unless you know all about them and made ample provision for installing the project and selling the land after the project is completed.

This, in my judgment, would be a very unwise expenditure of $175,000 for a dam, to begin with, but which will eventually cost this Government not much less than a million dollars, and, in my judgment, at the end of 10 years another dam will be necessary.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas yield to me?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. If I become vehement, I do not want the distinguished Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to think I shall have thereby become discourteous. I want to assert first, that I regard the distinguished Senator from Kansas as a Senator who knows as much, if not more, about Indians than does any other Member of this body; and yet I wish, in all courtesy, to say that he is mistaken. We are not proposing to construct a storage dam in the ordinary sense of that word.

Mr. President, when the Spaniards came to Arizona they found, as the Senator says, the Indians cultivating this land and raising cotton thereon. White settlers have from time to time in the past 30 years acquired some rights there. There have been rude diversion dams built out of brush. I have seen Indians, almost to their waistbands and armpits in the water, with their rude means trying to build a diversion dam on this river, with the hope that they might be able to divert this water out upon their lands.

If the distinguished Senator from Kansas wishes to—and I know he does—legislate for the benefit of the Indians, he will now take steps to assist in passing this legislation, so that further rights by white men will not be initiated there, as they have been from year to year for 20 years, and so that the remaining rights of the Indians may be preserved.

The question of silt in this connection can not become involved, because this is to be only a diversion dam, built 8 or 10 or 12 feet high, so that, instead of having a mere brush dam, water will be diverted out into ditches and from those ditches onto the lands of the Indians in order that they may get the water which now, uncontrolled, is passing them by to the sea.

Mr. CURTIS. I merely wish to ask a question. Does the Senator from Arizona say that this appropriation is not for the purpose of building a dam?

Mr. ASHURST. It is for the purpose of building a diversion dam a few feet in height.

Mr. CURTIS. And not a dam for the purpose of storing water?

Mr. ASHURST. Not at all. It is for the purpose of building a mere diversion dam, so that some of the waters of the tremendous floods that sweep by may be put upon the Indian land.

I have visited this place. I took the pains and trouble to go there last April and last May. There I saw the Indians trying with their rude means—and it was a pitiable thing to see—to haul sufficient brush to put in the streams, so as to get water to go out on their lands. No more meritorious provision could be carried in the bill than is this. It is not meritorious simply because the work is proposed to be done in my State, but it is in itself a meritorious proposition, and, I repeat, it has been estimated for and recommended by the department.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to ask the Senator another question. Has the Senator from Arizona any idea of how much this project will cost?

Mr. ASHURST. It will cost only the amount carried in the bill. I repeat it can not become an expense in the future except for maintenance. It is in no sense a storage dam. The great Roosevelt Storage Dam in Arizona, costing some ten or eleven million dollars, was of no practical value until the Granite Reef Diversion Dam was built. I think if the people of Arizona interested therein were asked to choose between having a diversion dam and a storage dam they would unqualifiedly say, "We want a diversion dam, because what is the use of storing water unless it can subsequently by means of a diversion dam be carried upon the land." It is not going to entail a future expenditure, except probably a few hundred dollars for maintenance. It is not, as I have said, a storage dam at all.

The Senator from Kansas at a previous period gave six years of loyal service to his country in the Senate. I hope he will not now reverse that record by his actions to-day in this instance, because what he proposes would be most unjust to the Indians and most unjust to himself.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, in view of the statement of the chairman of the committee that this is only a diversion dam, I am going to withdraw my objection, hoping that the matter may be adjusted in conference; but if it is to be a diversion dam the wording of the amendment must be changed.

Mr. ASHURST. I consent to any change necessary.

Mr. CURTIS. That can be looked after in conference. We can not very well change the language here. So far as I am concerned, I make no further objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before the amendment is agreed to, I wish to suggest the elimination of the words "and to remain available until expended," on page 24, in lines 3 and 4.

Mr. ASHURST. The philosophy of the Senator's suggestion is correct, but at this particular location floods come down and render it impossible at times to carry on the work. For instance, at this site on the Gila River in January, following a great snowstorm several feet deep and subsequent warm rains, floods so tremendous ensued that the entire American fleet could have passed safely right through at that point, the water being in such vast volume. As I have said, the work can not be carried on for long periods, and I hope the Senator will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator that with those words eliminated the bill would still provide an appropriation of $175,000, "to be immediately available." Therefore, as soon as the bill becomes a law that sum will be available and will remain available for the building of this diversion dam until June 30, 1917. If the Government of the United States is going to be any slower than that in prosecuting the work, I think we ought to appropriate less, and then make another appropriation for this project at some future time. I am quite sure, Mr. President, that the money appropriated will be expended before June 30, 1917.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, let me say a word to the Senator. I should be so much gratified to get the amendment agreed to that I would consent to almost anything; but we ought to be practical. This dam is going to be unusual in that it is going to be constructed possibly on top of quicksand, by using large quantities of granite bowlders and cement, somewhat like the character of construction of the Laguna project dam, with an apron perhaps several hundred yards long leading to a point and an apron of the same kind leading to a center on the other side, so that the weight of the water will press down and hold this concrete and rock in place. I do not want to appear captious, but I do think in this instance the words to which the Senator refers ought to remain in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, only $175,000 is to be expended; and I know just as well as I know that I am alive that that amount can be expended long before June 30, 1917. I am just as much interested in the project and its success as is the Senator from Arizona. I know the situation that exists there; I know that the work ought to be done immediately; but if these words remain in the bill perhaps the project will be shoved aside, it will dillydally along, and we can not tell when the work will be begun.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well; I withdraw my objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the amendment is voted on, I want to make an inquiry as to the reimbursable provisions of these various amendments. I have been greatly disappointed, having been always a friend of these irrigation projects, to find that the white people are very lax in the matter of reimbursing the Government. I want to ask the Senator if the Indians are doing any better in that regard than are the white people?

Mr. ASHURST. They are.

Mr. GALLINGER. Or is this language a mere figure of speech and not to be observed?

Mr. ASHURST. It is not a figure of speech. I will call the attention of the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire to the fact that in 1914 a sum of money, I think $15,000, was loaned to a certain tribe of Indians in Idaho, I believe, and in eight months it was reimbursed. That is a very good record. Of course many of these reimbursable appropriations which are made to the Indians will not be paid back, but I am advised by the department that 70 per cent of the amounts which are appropriated and made reimbursable will be repaid; and I think that is a creditable showing.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I may say, for the information of the Senator, that this amount constitutes a mortgage on their lands, and they will have to pay the money back. As soon as their lands are sold—and they become much more valuable after they are placed under water—the joke is always on the Indians and they get the point.

Mr. GALLINGER. A mortgage on the Indian lands would probably never be foreclosed.

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator will pardon me, referring to page 182 of the Senate hearings, the Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Mr. Meritt, in response to a question propounded by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], said:

> Yes, sir; the Pima Indians have ample property ultimately to reimburse the Government. We are not in favor of selling their surplus property at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say also that in a great many cases the money is already deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Indians; that the whole question is in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior; and that the Indian is powerless to do otherwise than to have it charged to his account.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, the thing that strikes me as being peculiar about this amendment is, first, that a large appropriation of $175,000 for the project is made to depend upon so many contingencies. I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the very last proviso of the amendment, reading:

> And provided further, That said project shall only be undertaken if the Secretary of the Interior shall be able to make or provide for what he shall deem to be satisfactory adjustments of the rights to the water to be diverted by said dam or carried in said canals, and satisfactory arrangements for the inclusion of lands within said project and the purchase of property rights which he shall deem necessary to be acquired, and shall determine and declare said project to be feasible.

Here we are appropriating $175,000 for a project in regard to which the Secretary of the Interior has not expressed an opinion as to whether or not it is a feasible one.

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator will pardon me, the Secretary of the Interior, by letter to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, in January, 1915; by letter to the chairman in February, 1916, and by letter to the chairman of the House committee, said the project was feasible. That language is carried in all, or nearly all, reclamation acts. I have no objection to it going out, however, if that is desired.

Mr. STERLING. Then I suggest that the words "and shall determine and declare said project to be feasible" be stricken out.

Mr. ASHURST. I have no objection to those words going out, although similar language is carried in all reclamation acts. I will ask, however, that those words be stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is one amendment to the amendment now pending, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 24, lines 3 and 4, it is proposed to amend the amendment by striking out the words "and to remain available until expended."

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I really have no serious objection to striking out those words; but as the chairman of the committee knows, the language of the amendment as it has been incorporated in the bill was drawn by the Indian Office, and I think we ought to leave it just as it is.

Mr. ASHURST. The amendment we are now discussing was originally drawn by the department. The committee did not dot an "i" nor cross a "t," but used the department's language.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, does not the Senator agree to the suggestion made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that 15 months will elapse before this appropriation ceases, while if it is left to be available until expended, without any limit, the Government may dawdle along and not complete the project as rapidly as they otherwise would do?

Mr. ASHURST. There is force in that contention.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so. Of course, if the project is not completed we can make another appropriation.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Utah will not insist on his amendment striking out the words "and to remain available until expended." The chairman of the committee knows very well that this matter was very carefully considered by the committee and that, on account of the peculiar conditions existing in that section of the country, it was deemed best to employ language that would leave this money available until such time as it might be expended. There is no question that the $175,000 will be used.

I think the Senate will recall that last year when the Indian appropriation bill was under consideration I opposed large appropriations to be taken out of the funds of the Indians to construct irrigation works on Indian lands. This is, however, a comparatively small amount; in fact, this bill does not carry large amounts for the construction of irrigation works, and I trust the Senator from Utah will not insist upon his motion to strike out.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the expenditure of $175,000 for the construction of a diversion dam can be made long before June 30, 1917, and the appropriation will be available until that time. I want the Government to go to work on this project and not put it off. I want the Indians and the settlers in that section to have the use of this water by June 30, 1917, or before then. What I am afraid of is that if this language remains in the bill those responsible for the work will dillydally along and the project will not be completed for a much longer period.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I want to assure the Senator from Utah that, according to the statement which has been made to the committee, this work will be commenced promptly. The Senator knows that water is everything in that section. The very existence of the people there depends upon the water used for irrigation. As I have said, the amount appropriated is small. It will benefit the Indians and, of course, it will benefit some of the whites; but in the main it is an Indian irrigation project.

Mr. SMOOT. Because I know the truth of what the Senator has said, I am in favor of this amendment, and I am asking that the words "and to remain available until expended" shall be stricken out in order that the Indians may get water at an earlier time than they would, in my opinion, if those words were left in the bill. For that reason I have offered the amendment to strike out those words.

Mr. GALLINGER. Question!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I want to express my very great gratification that we have commenced a discussion of these irrigation projects. I believe that when the future history of our connection with Indian affairs is written one of the matters connected therewith that we shall have most reason to blush for will have been the squandering of money on irrigation projects and making the amounts so paid reimbursable out of the Indian funds.

In regard to the matter of reimbursable funds I have personally, I think, in every case coming before the committee, asked the Commissioner or the Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who represented the department, if the affairs of the Indians fairly warranted the assertion that the reimbursable funds would eventually be returned to the Treasury, and where he has not been able to give us strong assurance that they would be returned and that the Indians could reimburse the Federal Treasury, I have opposed them. I am sorry to say that in the bill now there are some measures relating to irrigation which I fear will prove to be unprofitable to our wards, the Indians; and sometimes I have wondered if we ought not to make these appropriations directly from the Federal Treasury rather than make them an incumbrance upon the Indian lands.

We are the guardians of this unfortunate race, and I think the Senate, instead of reaching out and seeing how much of the Indians' money they can get hold of, ought to stand here as the defenders of that race. I hope that before we get through with this bill we will make some important reductions in the amounts which are proposed to be appropriated for irrigation purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, on page 23, line 22, after the word "a," I move to insert the word "diversion."

Mr. ASHURST. I cheerfully consent to that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 23, line 22, before the word "dam," it is proposed to insert the word "diversion," so that it will read, "of a diversion dam."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. On page 24, line 2, after the word "said," I move to insert the word "diversion."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 24, line 2, before the word "dam," it is proposed to insert the word "diversion."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. On line 13, after the word "said," I move to insert the word "diversion."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 24, line 13, before the word "dam," it is proposed to insert the word "diversion."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. In line 5, after the word "said" and before the word "dam," I move to insert the word "diversion."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 24, line 5, before the word "dam," it is proposed to insert the word "diversion."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. And on line 4, page 25, before the word "dam," I move to insert the word "diversion."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 25, line 4, before the word "dam," it is proposed to insert the word "diversion."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 25, after line 8, to strike out:

For maintenance and operation of the Ganado irrigation project on the Navajo Indian Reservation, in Arizona, $3,000, to be reimbursable and remain available until expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, after line 12, to insert:

For extension of the Ganado irrigation project on the Navajo Indian Reservation in Arizona for the irrigation of approximately 600 acres of land in addition to the area to be irrigated by said project, as authorized in section 2 of the act of August 24, 1912, $20,000; and for maintenance and operation of the project, $3,000; in all, $23,000, to remain available until expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, after line 20, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to cause to be made by competent engineers the necessary examinations, investigations, and surveys for the purpose of determining the most suitable and practicable method or methods of constructing levees, revetments, or other suitable works sufficient to prevent the Gila River from further eroding and wearing and washing away its banks and from further overflowing its banks at any point in Graham County, Ariz. Said engineers shall also determine and report upon the most suitable, feasible, and practicable means of holding the said river within a fixed channel as it flows through said Graham County. Said Secretary shall submit to Congress the results of such examinations, investigations, and surveys, together with an estimate of the cost thereof, with recommendations thereon, at the earliest practicable date. The sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of conducting said investigations, examinations, and surveys.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I want to ask the chairman of the committee if that is not a mistake? The committee agreed, when this bill was up, that that measure should be reported as a separate bill. I have examined the hearings very carefully, and I find no place in the hearings where the bill was again taken up and authorized to be placed upon this bill as an amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I think the Senator is correct, so far as concerns the hearings not showing any approval of the item as a part of this bill. My remembrance is, without consulting the record for the moment, that the item was approved as a separate and distinct bill, and yet I have a recollection that at another meeting, just a day or two before the bill was reported out, I asked consent to incorporate it in this bill, for the reason—although the hearings may not show it—that it was an emergency and that it might be subject to a point of order unless it was included in the bill. If it can be debated, I should like to say a few words on this appropriation.

Mr. CURTIS. I make the point of order on the amendment, if it is to be in here, that it is not germane.

Mr. ASHURST. In reply to that point of order, I say it has been reported favorably from a committee of the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. That does not make any difference.

Mr. ASHURST. That renders it impervious to a point of order. By Report No. 262 it was reported favorably from a standing committee of the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to call the chairman's attention to the object of the Indian appropriation bill:

That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of paying the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and in full compensation for all offices and salaries which are provided for herein for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand that the Senator from Kansas raises the question whether this amendment is germane or relevant to the bill?

Mr. CURTIS. I do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under clause 3 of Rule XVI, that is a question for the Senate to decide.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, in response to that, and in reply to the distinguished Senator from Kansas, I want to say, first, that the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs authorized a favorable report on this item which is in the bill. It is Report No. 262, Order of Business No. 239. That, in my judgment, renders it impervious to a point of order. In addition thereto, I want to say that this same Gila River, which so frequently goes upon such a destructive rampage, ought, in the judgment of the committee reporting this bill, to be the subject of an exhaustive and competent investigation. The item simply proposes that a board of engineers shall make an investigation to determine the most feasible and practicable method of holding the river within its bounds.

The Gila River debouches or comes out of a canyon, a box canyon, in the eastern part of Graham County, Ariz. It reaches the rich alluvial soil below a place called Sanchez, and from there down for the next 80 miles, at frequent intervals throughout the year, it overflows its banks, and with its cutting edge it destroys the rich lands of the whites and the rich lands of the Indians as well. Lands that are worth $200 per acre are being eaten away; and the 1,200 acres near Geronimo that belong to the Indians, and that the Indians are cultivating, are in the same danger. This cutting edge, as we call it, which the river has, wears away this rich land that the Indians are cultivating.

It would be idle to attempt to handle this question just from the standpoint of Geronimo alone. A careful and comprehensive investigation must be made by competent engineers.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question about the proposed amendment?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. How does this amendment affect the Indians?

Mr. ASHURST. I was just remarking that the river enters the reservation at Geronimo, and at that point it has been for some years cutting into the Indian lands. There are 1,200 acres cultivated at Geronimo, but there are 15,000 acres cultivated altogether by the Indians on this river. The committee was of the opinion that the whites and the Indians had a mutual interest. The river must be controlled. It is useless for the Government just to shut its eyes and say, "Well, sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof; we will take it up at another time." This matter must be given attention. If we are going to preserve the Indian lands and the lands which the Indians have cultivated, something must be done.

In addition to the Indian lands, there is a prosperous community of whites, 10,000 people, as excellent a people as have ever lived in any State. They never have had any assistance or any encouragement from the Government. They live in the towns of Solomonsville, Thatcher, Pima, Safford, and other towns along the river. They are agricultural people. This river cuts into their lands, destroys their lands, and goes on down in its destructive way and destroys the Indian lands. Surely they are not asking too much of their Government when they ask that, as a mutual proposition with the Indians and whites, the sum of $15,000 be appropriated, not to do any revetting but to investigate and determine the best means of controlling the river—whether it should be done by the Indians, by the whites, or by the settlers.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As I understand, then, this proposed appropriation is for the purpose of determining methods of revetment and protecting the banks along the course of the river throughout Graham County?

Mr. ASHURST. Throughout all of Graham County, and a large part of the Indian reservation is in Graham County.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. How much of it? How much of the length of the river?

Mr. ASHURST. In Graham County?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. How much of the Indian lands abut on the river that runs through Graham County?

Mr. ASHURST. Oh, I should say at least 50 miles or more.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Out of how many miles?

Mr. ASHURST. Out of 150 miles.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. About one-third of the length?

Mr. ASHURST. I should say at least that, if not more. There were two gentlemen who came from Arizona——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask the Senator further whether he thinks that Congress is under any obligation to make appropriations of this character for the purpose of protecting the lands of the white settlers?

Mr. ASHURST. Oh, I think so; undoubtedly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Upon what theory?

Mr. ASHURST. Upon the theory, first, that it is a mutual proposition. It would be absurd simply to say: "We will treat this river not as an entity and as an entirety but by sections. We will take care of this particular section that flows through an Indian reservation." How futile would be any attempt to take care of the river as a whole proposition by going below when the waters are coming down from above. Why not treat it as an entirety?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me put the question in another way, then. Suppose there were no Indian lands at all, Would the Senator then think the appropriation would be justified?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if there were no Indian lands at all I still think the appropriation would be justified, because an American citizen——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. How would it be justified on an Indian appropriation bill?

Mr. ASHURST. Whether or not it would be justified on an Indian appropriation bill might be a question; but I know of no other committee to which this could go. How could the Vice President send it to the Committee on Commerce? How could he send it to the Committee on Appropriations? To my mind it has to do with the revetment of a river which is doing great damage to rich Indian lands. Are we, because it happens to be of benefit to the whites, to stay our hands simply for that reason? Not at all. If an appropriation is for the real, substantial, honest good of the Indians, and incidentally for the good of the whites, why should we pause? Are we to say: "We will see that no white man shall have any benefit from an appropriation in this bill"?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator will understand that I am not objecting to the item; I am just inquiring about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Was this amendment moved by the direction of the committee?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I should like to make just one statement on that subject. I claim that there is no note of it being authorized in the hearings. Of course during some of the sessions I was not present; and if it was done, it was done during my absence from the committee. The measure was considered by the committee, and I desire to call the attention of the Chair and the Senate to the hearings, on page 481:

The CHAIRMAN. What is the pleasure of the committee? Do you want to consider this bill now or take it up later? Do you desire to vote now? If not, is there any objection to the bill?

Senator CURTIS. Are you offering it as an amendment to the appropriation bill?

The CHAIRMAN. No; I have framed it as a separate and independent bill.

Senator CURTIS. I have no objection to its being introduced as a separate bill if it is not to be an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. May I report the bill favorably?

(Without objection, the chairman was authorized to report the bill favorably.)

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator has, of course, read exactly what took place at that particular time; but I insist—and it seems to me that the Senator was present, because he was very faithful in his attendance—that I became apprehensive, owing to the cluttered condition of business——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Do not the committees of the Senate keep records? How is the Chair to rule unless there is some record which tells about this matter?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the record, and that which renders it impervious to a point of order, is the fact that it has been reported favorably from a standing committee of the Senate, and it is on the bill.

Mr. CURTIS. It was reported as a separate and distinct measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not know whether he can go behind the returns or not. There seems to be a dispute here between members of the committee as to whether or not the matter was reported by the committee.

Mr. ASHURST. Oh, I unhesitatingly say that it was reported by the committee. Whether or not that was a wise thing or an expedient thing to do, it was done. There is no question about that. I do not want to raise a question of fact between the Senator from Kansas and myself, but it was reported.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I have not disputed the Senator's word. All I say is that it was not reported while I was there, and I have read all of the hearings, and I find no memorandum in regard to it, and there was a stenographer taking all of the hearings.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In accordance with the decision of the Hayes-Tilden controversy, the Chair will not go behind the fact that the committee has reported the amendment. He leaves the question of relevancy to the Senate. The amendment comes here from the committee, and the Chair will not attempt now to decide a question between members of the committee as to whether it comes into the Senate as an amendment proposed by the committee; but the question of the relevancy of the amendment on an appropriation bill is for the Senate to decide.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I should like to have included in the RECORD a copy of the testimony taken before the committee on this question, the statement of my colleague, and the statement of the two gentlemen who came from Arizona, in regard to this appropriation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, that may be done.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. ASHURST, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted the following report, to accompany S. 4655:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4655) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to determine the most suitable method of preventing further erosion and overflow on Gila River, Ariz., having investigated the same, reports the bill back to the Senate and recommends that it do pass without amendment.

As part of this report the committee submits the statements of Phil C. Merrill, of Pima, Ariz.; W. W. Pace, of Thatcher, Ariz.; Senator MARK SMITH and Senator HENRY F. ASHURST, of Arizona, made before this committee on the Indian appropriation bill, as follows:

"STATEMENT OF PHIL C. MERRILL, OF PIMA, ARIZ.

"The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ASHURST). What is your name?

"Mr. MERRILL. Phil C. Merrill.

"The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live?

"Mr. MERRILL. In Pima, Graham County, Ariz.

"The CHAIRMAN. You have, of course, read this bill, introduced by me, providing for an appropriation of $15,000 to make a survey and investigation as to the status of affairs regarding the Gila River in Arizona?

"Mr. MERRILL. Yes, sir.

"The CHAIRMAN. Will you please tell the committee briefly what you know about it and what you think the necessity for the bill is?

"Mr. MERRILL. I have lived in Graham County for about 25 years. The Gila River enters Graham County from the southeast and flows northwesterly for a distance of about 60 miles through a region that is cultivated partly by white people and partly by Indians on the San Carlos Reservation. The conditions pertaining along that river for its full length in Graham County are similar—the conditions under which the Indians take their water from the river are practically similar to those under which the white men take the water. In the early days a heavy growth of vegetation for a great extent held back these flood waters and prevented the damage that the river did. We know that for a great many years past that has been increasing, until within the past few years the land that has been lost by erosion, both on the Indian reservation and above there where the white people have settled, has been very great. It is estimated that during the flood, just about a month ago, 1,500 acres of our vicinity was washed away. We know we are incapable of determining what should be done, and we need the assistance of the department as to what is the best method to control the river, and, as has been mentioned by your chairman, we know that the interests are mutual as between the whites and the Indians. If we were to take care of the river banks above the Indian reservation, it would do them no good below, for the same condition exists.

"As mentioned by the chairman, there are about 1,200 acres that have been in a high state of cultivation by the San Carlos Indians along that river, on the San Carlos Indian Reservation, but I think at the present time, and during this year, they will be unable to cultivate any of that land, or practically none of it, because of the fact that there are dams and canals that have been washed away, and it will be necessary, in order to get the water on their land again, to have new dams and new canals, beside the loss of the land they have sustained.

"Our object is to enlist Federal aid in engineering questions in order to determine what is the best and most feasible method of controlling that stream, for if it is not done it will not be many years, as conditions are existing now, before practically all the tillable land along the banks of that river will be washed away, because the river, in its meandering course, is cutting away each year and taking away many acres of very valuable land.

"Senator PAGE. Could not this examination be made by the engineers of the Army?

"Mr. MERRILL. Well, we think, perhaps, an Army board or a board appointed by the Interior Department, either would be suitable.

"Senator PAGE. If it was done by the Army engineers, would there be any necessity for this appropriation?

"Mr. MERRILL. I think so. I am not advised of that, but I think so.

"Senator PAGE. I had the impression that the Army engineers were sent out to do this kind of work, and that there was a general appropriation made that would cover the expense; of course there would be no salary.

"Mr. MERRILL. I am not advised as to that, but I do not so understand it.

"The CHAIRMAN. If you will pardon me, Senator, I will say that we looked into that matter and ascertained that it would require an appropriation.

"Senator PAGE. For what purpose?

"The CHAIRMAN. Because the War Department would not be authorized to send an Army engineer to make an expensive investigation and take the money for that purpose out of the general fund. It would not be authorized by law to do so. We looked into that feature of it with some degree of care.

"Senator PAGE. This is a gratuity appropriation, I understand, from the Treasury?

"The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; of $15,000.

"Senator PAGE. Please explain where the necessity for the expenditure comes in.

"Mr. MERRILL. As I have stated, this tillable land extends a distance of about 60 miles along the river. The valley is narrow and long. The Indian reservation on the San Carlos is about 25 or 30 miles, and the balance is occupied by the white people above it, so you can understand that it would be quite a task to make that survey along the banks of that river to determine what methods are best to control it.

"Senator CURTIS. What efforts have you made to control it?

"Mr. MERRILL. There have been efforts made by farmers by driving piles, etc., but it has been demonstrated that there would have to be some systematic scheme adopted to take care of it all, because one farmer might protect his land and a little above him his neighbor, being unable to do the same thing, it would wash behind him and give one more protection than the other.

"Senator PAGE. Then it is your idea not only to have this investigation, but have the Government appropriate the money to protect the land?

"Mr. MERRILL. That would, of course, be a matter to be followed up. I assume there would have to be some arrangement made whereby the Government would pay its proportion and the property owners their proportion of the expense after the scheme had been adopted to control the river.

"Senator CURTIS. Is most of this damage done in the spring when the snow melts?

"Mr. MERRILL. There are two seasons of the year—the spring and the summer time, during the summer rains. It is not so much the overflow that damages us as it is the erosion.

"Senator CURTIS. The silt that comes down?

"Mr. MERRILL. Not the silt, but the water that washes it away.

"Senator CURTIS. But the silt does come down and helps to do that?

"Mr. MERRILL. Yes, sir.

"Senator CURTIS. Has not this question been pretty thoroughly investigated by the Geological Survey?

"Mr. MERRILL. Not that I know of.

"Senator CURTIS. Did they not, some 10 years ago, go all over the Gila River and make a report upon that subject?

"Mr. MERRILL. Not that I have been informed of. I think they made an investigation of the amount of water——

"Senator CURTIS. That came down in the flow?

"Mr. MERRILL. That money was appropriated for irrigation purposes, etc.; but, as far as this matter particularly is concerned, I have heard no report upon the question.

"Senator CURTIS. I did not mean that they had reported on what was necessary to prevent the washing; they did not investigate for that purpose, but they did investigate as to the flow and as to the seasons of the year when the flows were bad.

"Mr. MERRILL. Yes, sir; I think that is correct.

"Senator CURTIS. Has any effort been made, Mr. Chairman, to get the Geological Survey to make an investigation and report on this subject?

"The CHAIRMAN. I will say we have consulted the Arizona delegation in Congress and these two gentlemen from Arizona; we have consulted with the Secretary of the Interior upon the matter. We had a personal interview.

"Senator CURTIS. Did you go over the records of the Geological Survey?

"The CHAIRMAN. No; we did not have a consultation with the director himself. We took it up with the Secretary direct.

"Senator PAGE. Does he think this action is an appropriate one on our part?

"The CHAIRMAN. I am not at liberty to quote him. I think I may go far enough to say that he certainly expressed no opposition to it. It is always dangerous to quote a man unless you have it in writing. However I am willing to say for this record that I had an extended interview with the Secretary on last Saturday, and he is not opposed to this matter. On the contrary, he looked with considerable favor and sympathy upon it.

"Senator PAGE. I do not want to oppose a $15,000 appropriation for your State, but if we have officials whose duty it is to make these investigations—the Geological Survey or the Board of Army Engineers—I do not know whether it is a healthy precedent to establish or not.

"The CHAIRMAN. If you will pardon me, you will recall, I think, that there was some discussion in 1912 on the question as to whether the Board of Army Engineers—Senator CURTIS will remember the occurrence—had the authority to make an investigation and a report to Congress, unless they were specifically charged with that duty. I looked it up at the time and came to the conclusion that it would require an act of Congress or an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill to authorize any board of Army engineers, under the direction of the Interior Department, to go out and make an investigation unless they were authorized by Congress to do that. I have a very definite impression in 1912 I looked it up.

"Senator PAGE. What is the duty of the Board of Army Engineers or of the Geological Survey if it is not to take up matters of the most pressing importance and focus their minds upon it and make a report?

"The CHAIRMAN. Their duties are manifold, but an appropriation of money from the Federal Treasury can not be used for a particular purpose except in accordance with a bill duly passed and which shall become a law. You can not, under eminum gatherum, detail men to do certain work unless the law is written that way.

"Senator PAGE. I supposed the law was written in that way.

"The CHAIRMAN. In other words, money must be expended in pursuance of a bill or a joint resolution, of course. There are men around this table who have had more experience on these subjects than I have.

"Senator PAGE. It may be expended in pursuance of a general act or a specific act. We appropriate large sums of money, and they are supposed, as it seems to me, to be devoted to just such investigations as the one proposed here.

"The CHAIRMAN. I know of no authority for that; I certainly have been unable to find any authority to permit any Army board to go here and make this investigation except we pass an act of this kind.

"Senator PAGE. What particular reasoning led you to believe that this $15,000 was the proper sum to appropriate here?

"The CHAIRMAN. In 1912 the Army board was authorized to make an investigation as to the feasibility, practicability, and suitability of a reservoir site at San Carlos. I was a member of the committee at that time; $15,000 was appropriated. A board of Army engineers was duly authorized to make the investigation, but we learned that the $15,000 was not sufficient, and in 1913 a deficiency appropriation of $10,000 more was made to pay the expense of that investigation. Now, this will by no means be as comprehensive or as extensive as that one was, and I came to the conclusion that if we asked for $25,000 for that, this ought to be done for $15,000.

"Senator PAGE. Senator CURTIS, you have had a great deal of experience on this line. What do you say about this establishing a precedent that will return to vex us at any time?

"Senator CURTIS. It will be like every one that we have heretofore established. Next year they will come in and ask for $100,000; the next year for $200,000, and the next year for $300,000. This committee has never established a precedent of this kind with respect to any of these matters that has not been abused. They commenced with a small appropriation—as you will observe if you will look over the bills—and they keep growing year by year. My own judgment is that if the Senator wants this done he ought to go to the Geological Survey, and I think they will tell him very frankly that if he can get a very small increase in their general appropriation, if they have not enough now, that they will send men down to make this investigation and make a full report, without establishing a precedent in this committee, by appropriating for something of this kind.

"Senator PAGE. Does not this appropriation look forward to a much larger appropriation next year?

"The CHAIRMAN. We are in the dark, both as to the Indians and as to the whites. I am very familiar with the proposition. It is a meritorious appropriation, in my opinion Here is a river that is cutting away rich Indian land and similarly cutting away rich land of the whites year by year. This is a small county. There is not a millionaire in the county, but it is filled with most excellent citizens. We do not know how to reach the matter. I had at first an idea of introducing a bill providing an appropriation of $100,000, but I reflected on it and thought there should first be some investigation made by somebody authorized by Congress. So I have put my cards on the table. I want you to see them. I want you to say whether there should be an investigation or not. If the Army board investigates it, or the Board of Engineers investigates it, and they say we can do nothing, and ought to do nothing, or we are unable to do anything, we can do no more.

"Senator PAGE. I agree with you that there ought to be something done about this matter.

"The CHAIRMAN. If the Army board says, 'We ought to do something,' then we can proceed, at least in law, on some technical information upon which we can rely. That is my—I would not say excuse, because this is so meritorious that it needs no excuse—but that is my reason for introducing this amendment.

"Mr. MERITT. The board of Army engineers has also made a report as to certain features of the San Carlos River, for example, the San Carlos Reservoir site. So far as the Indian Office is concerned, we would be very glad to have this appropriation, because this river flows through the Pima Indian Reservation and has damaged a large acreage of land, which is being destroyed annually by this river. If any scheme can be devised by which this wild river can be kept within its banks, it will be very helpful to the Pima Indians.

"The CHAIRMAN. I am very glad to receive that statement. My colleague, Senator MARK SMITH, is here now. Senator SMITH, we have had up my bill proposing to appropriate $15,000 to make investigation and examination for the purpose of controlling the Gila River in Arizona.

"STATEMENT OF HON. MARK SMITH, UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM ARIZONA.

"Senator SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what I could say in addition to what has already been said by Mr. Merrill and Mr. Pace.

"The CHAIRMAN. Mr Merrill has made a statement to the committee.

"Senator SMITH of Arizona. If you will start in on the Gila River about 10 miles above where Solomonsville is now situated—and will be unless the river washes it away some of these days—you will observe that the river comes down at a pretty solid formation. It strikes this alluvial level plain. It serves a most prosperous community. They have worked harder and got less from the Government than any other irrigation people that I know of, except some of the places in Utah in the early days. They have never received one cent of compensation from the Government in any way—not a dollar. By their own industry, starting back in the days of the Indians, up until now, they have developed a community that is an honor to any country and which possesses as good citizenship as any State of the Union.

"Now, this river, when it comes down with its great floods, disemboweling itself at the mouth onto the alluvial plain, begins to cut these trenches, and a bridge that I have seen at Florence standing a mile and a half out in the dry plain that once covered the stream—an expensive bridge—it stands there to-day a monument to the treachery of that river.

"Senator PAGE. Is it a monument, too, to the foolishness of any of our officials?

"The CHAIRMAN. The State built it.

"Senator SMITH of Arizona. Oh, the State built it. You need not think there is anything there that our officials had anything to do with, except probably laying the burden of taxes upon the people.

"Senator PAGE. It was wisely built when it was built, in your judgment, was it?

"Senator SMITH of Arizona. It was built at the best possible place on the Gila River, down at Florence. If I had a photograph, I could show you the condition.

"Senator PAGE. How much do you think there will probably be required from the Federal Treasury later on if this investigation is made?

"Senator SMITH of Arizona. I do not know that it will require anything. These men can make the investigation, a scientific investigation, as to the proper way of handling this river, and, especially if it is done above, it will not only help these people above where these particular men live [indicating Mr. Merrill and Mr. Pace], but it will help everybody on the Gila River at the San Carlos Reservation.

"It flows down through the Maricopa Reservation and goes on and empties into the Colorado at Yuma, Ariz., on the line of California and Arizona. Now, to put the burden on these people of holding that river in check for the benefit of the Indians, for the benefit of two great American white irrigation schemes, and for these men to bear the whole burden of keeping that river within its flow, if it is not done above them, it is a waste to all.

"So that this is not a mere scheme to help these men here and several other farmers. It is also to keep a regular channel for the Indians on the Maricopa Reservation, to the white people in the Florence Reservation, and to the Indians in the Florence Reservation, who are going to get a greater benefit from it under the bill, if it is passed, than anybody else that I know of.

"So this whole scheme must look to the Government at least for a legitimate means of accomplishing the purpose of holding that river within its boundaries, or else it will become a ruinous flood and will wash everybody away.

"Senator PAGE. Would you regard this appropriation as a proper one to make here if there were no Indians there?

"Senator SMITH of Arizona. Unquestionably; whether there was or not, I would regard it as such for this reason, which it is difficult for people to understand: Arizona was admitted as a State, and you will be amazed at the statement of fact that at the time of admission the Federal Government absolutely owned, controlled, and has reserved 90 per cent of the available valuable land in that State, and we are forced to levy taxation on cattle and mines and town lots. That is what we have got to run the State on. The Government has land to such an extent that I think the whole of the New England States would be covered by the different reservations of my State alone.

"Senator PAGE. I have been through one of your counties, which I know is larger than my State.

"Senator SMITH of Arizona. There are plenty of them. New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut would certainly not cover the reservations of Arizona. Now, we are left in that attitude. How? By taking away our power to tax ourselves for any improvements. As I have stated, 90 per cent of the really valuable lands in the State are held by the Government, and you are putting a burden on these people who have spent their lives, and their children's children are there now working out the same problems that their fathers had and that their grandfathers had.

"Now, it is just a question whether Congress will pass this resolution to give us that small amount of money for investigation, not only for those gentlemen there but for everybody on the Gila River from its source to where it empties. As soon as it comes out it spreads, and in the very next place you find the shortage is at the Indian reservation in Maricopa County known as the Maricopa Reservation. There was a bridge there three-quarters of a mile long or more—a bridge that these waters have swept away, coming into another channel and coming down into Pinal Valley, and washed that bridge, three-quarters of a mile long, completely away. There [indicating] is one of the bridges. You will see what it does to a bridge standing there a quarter of a mile long.

"Senator PAGE. It occurred to me that this was an examination which looked forward to a very large appropriation some time in the future from the Federal Treasury.

"Senator SMITH of Arizona. I know; but even if it does, it is a question for Congress's discretion to say, even then when it comes up, whether it would be a wise appropriation or not.

"Senator PAGE. That is right; we do not know from this bill—at least I did not know when this bill was first read—whether it was a harmless bill calling for simply $15,000 or something that looked forward to $5,000,000.

"Senator SMITH of Arizona. It will never get to any such figure as that. It would be futile. I want to say that I would never advocate an expenditure of more money than is provided for in this resolution, but then it would be before you gentlemen to take it off if you had that bigger proposition here. You have been given the information, and that is all we are asking in this resolution; and if Congress will not help, you will at least let every man on the Gila River know what is the best thing to do to keep that river within its bounds.

"Senator PAGE. I think that is correct.

"Senator SMITH of Arizona. But if they can not do it, then they may come to Congress, and it will be within the wisdom of you gentlemen to say.

"Senator PAGE. Would you think this would be a proper matter for the Indian Committee to take up on the Indian appropriation bill?

"Senator SMITH of Arizona. I unquestionably think so, because I know of no other committee to send it to. The Commerce Committee has nothing to do with that, because they deal with navigable streams. The Committee on Appropriations has nothing to do with it. They would say, 'We have nothing to do with this part of the business; why do you not go to some other of your committees?' The Agricultural Committee has nothing to do with it, for it does not deal with Indian questions at all, and I will state frankly that it is brought here because I do not know where else to send it. That is the reason it is before as good a committee as there is in this body.

"Senator PAGE. Oh, yes; it is a splendid committee.

"Senator SMITH of Arizona. There is not one crank on it as big a crank as I am. But, gentlemen, this ought to be done, not only because of the suggestions I have made, but because of the question that is naturally raised—and I think you gentlemen, as able legislators, always raise the question as to whether this is an entering wedge to rob the Treasury hereafter. We have seen departments grow that have started with $500 or $700 or $800.

"But I submit that it is essential that this knowledge be given us by the Government on account of the condition in the State and the condition of the Indians and the condition of the white men, for they are put exactly in the same fix down there, and that we at least ought to give it to the State and the people and let our State handle it, or the people try to handle it; and when they have obtained a scientific knowledge of the situation, then we can do our very best. If I come to Congress again for another dollar of help, I hope to be able to show Congress that they can not avoid it; but if Congress in its wisdom says, 'We can not afford to go into this sort of thing, as it will set a precedent for a hundred other cases,' and decide against me, why, that is for the occasion and the time when it comes. Very likely I will be, as I have sometimes been before on the most virtuous matters, cut off from any further communication with the Treasury Department. But this ought to be done, and these men who have spent their time in coming up here to attend to it ought to know how to do it, for I do not know how it could be done. It would take a scientific engineering proposition to say whether what little land is left in Arizona is to be ruined by the river, or whether Congress, out of its abundance, will say, 'We will give you a little aid, at least a scientific investigation, and see whether you can possibly yourselves handle this problem or not.'

"Gentlemen, I have another committee to attend and will have to retire. I thank you very much for your attention.

"Senator LANE. I would like to ask you, Senator ASHURST, how much Indian land is involved in this matter?

"The CHAIRMAN. About 1,200 acres of cultivated below a place called Geronimio, but several thousand acres of Indian reservations are within this county.

"Senator LANE. And how much of the white man's land?

"The CHAIRMAN. About 30,000 acres cultivated by the whites, but 1,200 acres at one point on the river belong to the Indians.

"Senator LANE. Is it reimbursable?

"The CHAIRMAN. No, sir; it is not reimbursable out of any fund.

"Senator LANE. It is to be an appropriation from the Treasury Department?

"The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

"Senator LANE. The solution, and the only solution, of these washouts in the long run in Arizona, where you have that trouble—you have fine land below, and the flood comes down on it every year—is to impound the water, is it not?

"Mr. MERRILL. That is a question to be determined.

"Senator LANE. You will never get out of it in any other way.

Mr. MERRILL. That is a question for the engineers. I think they will tell us whether that is the more feasible.

"Senator LANE. And whether you will have water to let down on the land when you get it. In the other way it runs away and goes to waste in the summer time in that country, and you will have to begin a system in the mountains of impounding the water into the ravines and all the gulches leading into the main streams, and when you have done that you have stopped the waste and have water impounded for irrigation. That is the only solution of it. How else can you do it, unless you dike it and levee the rivers, and then you will be in a condition like the Mississippi—you will have your river up above the lands after a while.

"Senator PAGE. Do you not think this becomes an irrigation problem within a short time, and is something that so slightly affects the Indians that it ought to be made a general proposition rather than an Indian proposition?

"Mr. MERRILL. I think the Indians are vitally affected by it. I know that from my observation and experience.

"Senator PAGE. Do you say they have 1,200 acres of land?

"The CHAIRMAN. That is only at one point, Senator.

"Senator PAGE. We had much better buy that land of the Indians and let it be destroyed than to go into a $100 or $200 or $500 project here with its possibilities of loss and risk as we have done in several irrigation projects. I do not want to interpose any further objection to this proposition, Senator. I do want to know more about it.

"STATEMENT OF MR. W. W. PACE, THATCHER, ARIZ.

"Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the people there are trying to teach the San Carlos Indians the art of cultivating the farms; that is, agriculture, and as the matter stands now, and as it is going, it will be only a very short time before there will be no lands on the San Carlos Indian Reservation for these men to farm. It is not only the value of the 1,200 acres of land, but when that is gone it has all gone. When those farms are gone they can not be replaced; they will not be on the reservation for the Indians to be taught this art of agriculture.

"Senator PAGE. Let us pursue that investigation a little further. If you have some land there that is worth a one-tenth part of the expense it will take to conserve that land should we start in in Congress with a proposition that looks to conserving at a great deal more than the value of the property conserved?

"Mr. PACE. Senator, we do not think it is ever going to run into that kind of cost. We have our ideas, but we have no way of determining the best means. We have no board of engineers to give us absolute knowledge. We have had no experience. That waste has been going on within the last few years worse than it ever has been. We got along very nicely for a good many years, but later the burden has become so heavy that we can not stand it, and we do not know how to control the situation. We have an idea by which private individuals will expend a few thousand dollars over there. That has some effect; but each man has his own peculiar ideas about it; one man works it out one way and another another. We do not work concertedly.

"The proposition that our Senator has so kindly consented to introduce here is for a small appropriation that we might know what is best, and that the Government, through the War Department, or through some of the corps of engineers that they have, and through their experience in cases of this kind, they might give us a plan setting out what could be done to keep this river under control and to keep it in one channel. As long as it runs straight we have no trouble, but when it runs straight a mile, or such matter, it will take a turn over that way and bore out a section of country, and then turn and go the other way. It is a curving, tortuous stream there, and it is ruining some towns and breaking up some of the best citizens of our country.

"Senator PAGE. I have a very fine meadow that is being eaten into every year, but I have no idea of coming to Congress for assistance.

"Mr. PACE. This is quite a big stream, and the final result of it will be to depopulate the San Carlos Indians who are farming part of their reservation. That will be the end of the matter. It is cutting into that.

"Senator PAGE. I think I have reached my purpose. I rather think the appropriation is one that we ought to make. I did, however, want to draw out the fact, because it seemed to me to be a proposition that was to be an entering wedge and that there would be quite a large demand on the part of Arizona upon the Federal Treasury.

"Mr. PACE. We can see some places in Arizona where we could use that money nicely, but we hardly think we will be able to get it. It is not the intention that this should be an entering wedge for larger appropriations; it is simply in order that we may know just where we are. We want you to tell us what can be done in a scientific way and an effective way, and we do not know anybody else to look to except the Army engineers or some corps of engineers of the General Government.

"The CHAIRMAN. Let me say, lest some misapprehension may arise from my statement as to 1,200 acres being irrigated, I meant at one particular point. I have in my hand the report made to Congress in 1914 regarding these Indians. It says some 15,000 acres of Indian lands are irrigated.

"I would not want the Senators to get the impression that that was the only territory.

"Senator LANE. No; you said several others. If you gentlemen had brought this in as a definite proposition, to go up into those mountains and put in dams and catchment basins in and across the ravines that feed into the river or channel, and hold that water in there for irrigation, you would at the same time stop the erosion. I would like to see this Government make large appropriations to help Arizona to do that and as well all over the country. They have the richest land in the world. The water comes down in a rush, and they not only get no use of the water, but it destroys valuable land. Eventually that will have to be done. I have been in Arizona many times, and have felt that I would like to be superintendent of the job and hold that water. It would make of it the most fertile and richest State in the Union. There is no doubt of that. I suppose some one, however, would grab the water from the Indians. I think that ought to be provided for. They could utilize an appropriation of a million dollars in Arizona for that purpose; it is wise, and I know of no other place in the world where they have so much water at certain seasons and get so little use of it, or where it could be used for better purposes. There is not a State in the Union that compares with it; if it had water that is the truth of it.

"The CHAIRMAN. I appreciate the statement of the Senator. It is a very fair statement. He says that the water will be gobbled up by the Indians——

"Senator LANE. No; I did not say the Indians.

"The CHAIRMAN. Or gobbled away from the Indians.

"Senator LANE. Yes.

"The CHAIRMAN. I want to say at once for Arizona that there is no State in the Union where the Indians are better protected.

"Senator LANE. I hope so.

"The CHAIRMAN. The Indians are so well protected in my State that the newspapers are almost unanimous in saying that you must be an Indian to secure any of your rights from the Federal Government. No State has with more scrupulous care seen to it that the rights of property of the Indians are protected. Arizona has the largest Indian population of any State in the Union except the State of Oklahoma."

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the judgment of the Senate, Is this amendment relevant to the appropriation bill? All those who believe the amendment is relevant will say "aye." [A pause.] Those who believe it is not relevant will say "no." [A pause.]

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I do not want to delay this bill. I had hoped this amendment would be agreed to without any great contest. It seems a pity. I hope the Senator will withdraw his point.

Mr. CURTIS. I make the point of order that debate is not in order during a vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question of the vote will have to be settled. All who believe the amendment is relevant will rise. [A pause.] All who believe it is not relevant will rise. [A pause.] The Senate decides that the amendment is relevant. Now the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 14, after the word "available," to strike out "reimbursable to the United States by the Indians having tribal rights on said reservation and to remain a charge and lien upon the lands and funds belonging to said Indians until paid," so as to make the clause read: "For the construction of three additional steel spans with abutment and piers to extend the bridge across the Gila River on the San Carlos Indian Reservation near San Carlos, Ariz., $17,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, after line 17, to insert:

For preservation and repair of prehistoric pueblo ruins and cliff dwellings, under supervision of the Smithsonian Institution, Navajo National Monument, Ariz., $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "California," in section 3, page 28, line 1, after the word "Indians," to strike out "$10,000" and insert "$30,000"; so as to make the clause read:

For the purchase of lands for the homeless Indians in California, including improvements thereon, for the use and occupancy of said Indians, $30,000, said funds to be expended under such regulations and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, after line 13, to strike out:

For support and education of 100 Indian pupils at the Fort Bidwell Indian School, Cal., including pay of superintendent, $18,200; for general repairs and improvements, $3,600; in all, $21,800.

And to insert:

For support and education of 125 Indian pupils at the Fort Bidwell Indian School, Cal., including pay of superintendent, $22,375; for general repairs and improvements, $5,000; for new school building, $8,000; in all, $35,375.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will not be agreed to. This is one of the schools that I called attention to upon yesterday. It is now costing the Government $318.87 per capita to educate the children in this school, and it seems to me the appropriation allowed by the House is sufficient. We propose to add $14,000 to their appropriation; and in view of the large expenditure per capita I think the Senate is not justified in increasing the House appropriation, and I hope the amendment may be rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 28, after line 22, to strike out:

For support and education of 90 Indian pupils at the Greenville Indian School, California, including pay of superintendent, $16,530; for general repairs and improvements, $3,600; for purchase of additional land for school farm, $1,500; in all, $21,630.

And to insert:

For support and education of 100 Indian pupils at the Greenville Indian School, California, including pay of superintendent, $18,400; for general repairs and improvements, including purchase of additional land for school farm, $8,000; for new school building, $8,000; in all, $34,400.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will disagree to that amendment. It costs at this school $279.62 per capita to educate the children, and the Senate committee has increased the appropriation about $13,000 over the House appropriation.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I just wish to say that the figures as agreed to by the Senate committee are in exact accord with the estimate, and that the department officials stated that they needed that sum. I will ask the Senator to refer to page 197 of the House hearings.

Mr. SMOOT. In that connection I should like to say to the Senator, that if the Appropriations Committee agreed to the amounts estimated by all the departments of the Government, the appropriations for this year would be five or six or seven million dollars more than they will be, as reported to the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. They would be more than five or six millions more.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; a good deal more than that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I am sorry to disagree with the distinguished Senator from Kansas in regard to this matter of education. I say I am sorry to do so, because he and I usually agree very well in regard to the matters concerning which we are legislating.

The claim was made, as I remember, by some one speaking for California, that the Fort Bidwell Indian School provided for only 100 pupils, whereas we were assured that there were over 125 that should attend that school. I know we have rejected that amendment, at the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas; but this case is like unto it. They had 90 Indian pupils at the Greenville Indian School, and some one—either a Member of the House or a Senator, as I remember—came to us and said that that school would not accommodate the pupils who should attend it; that instead of there being 90 Indian pupils, we should provide for 100.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. PAGE. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. Why not provide for these children in schools where it does not cost the Government over $200 per capita, instead of buying new lands and erecting new buildings where it is now costing the Government $279 per capita to educate those children, when the rule has been heretofore $167 per child?

Mr. PAGE. Answering the Senator from Kansas, I want to say that, as I remember, it was found absolutely impracticable to send these scholars to the ordinary public schools. I think the question was asked as to the distance between these scholars and the public schools, and my recollection is that it was absolutely impracticable to give them the ordinary public-school training.

I do not want to read any lecture on the benefits of education. I have done that too much already; but I believe that if there is any way under heaven in which we can give these Indians an education that will fit them to be good citizens, we ought not to be parsimonious in what we give them. Really, it is not a gift, because we have provided in our treaties with the Indians that they shall have an education. I am not certain that we have in the case of this particular band of Indians, but I understand that the principle running through our treaties is that we shall give them an education and civilization.

I am ready to cut this bill at almost any point, I do not care where, before I commence on education. I do not want to see any privilege withheld. I do not believe that the matter of expense, unless it is exorbitant, should be taken into consideration. If we have a school that is fitted for 100 scholars, and it finally grows so that there is a demand for accommodations for 125, I think we should provide for 125 scholars at that school. If it is fitted for 90, and there are 100 scholars, I think we ought to have a school large enough to take care of 100. I do not think it is unreasonable or extravagant to do that.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Kansas I desire to say that this school is far from a railway station and has a smaller enrollment, and that accounts for the per capita cost of it. The school building is in a dilapidated condition, unfit for use, and hence provision is made in this increase for a new schoolhouse. This seems to be an exceptional case, and there is perfect agreement and accord between the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs and the department, which is cognizant of all the facts and conditions in the case, and has not ordinarily been generous in making recommendations.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I agree with what the Senator from Vermont has said, that these Indians living in California are in scattered bands; that they are very poor and are very much in need of educational facilities. I am sure there is no one who is more interested in Indian affairs than the Senator from Kansas. He may, however, have overlooked the fact that these Indians have no property other than what the Government is now buying for them. As I said, they are scattered all over the mountains of the State; they are far away from cities, and the assistant commissioner was very anxious to have this appropriation made. He satisfied me that the appropriation is very badly needed.

Mr. CURTIS. If the Senator will yield, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. GRONNA. I thought the Senator would withdraw it on further consideration.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask merely for information why is it that this charge per capita is so enormous?

Mr. GRONNA. I can answer the Senator. The reason is that the schools are small, and, of course, the overhead charges are necessarily very large.

Mr. LODGE. In the little town in which I live, which is near the large city of Lynn, with one of the best high schools in the State, we can send children to Lynn, pay the transportation, taking them over and bringing them back, and pay for their education at the Lynn High School for $125, and in the small high school we have in the town the per capita cost is decidedly much less.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will allow me, I will say further that this is simply the beginning of the building up of these schools for these Indians. The lands have been bought recently for them. Of course there were some settlements where a few Indians have lived, but the Government has been constantly increasing the holdings and buying small tracts of land and adding to the Indian holdings, and of course the schools have been increased.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from California said the building had been so much used that it had been worn out, so I supposed from that the school had been going for some time. But what strikes me is the enormous expenditure per capita. Why should it cost so much more per capita to educate children there?

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me for a moment? In addition to what the Senator from California has said, I wish to read from page 199 of the House committee hearings, which will explain the reason for the increase.

Mr. LODGE. Then why did not the House committee put it in if it had it explained to them?

Mr. ASHURST. These reasons were given by the commissioner to the House committee.

Mr. LODGE. It does not seem to have convinced the House committee.

Mr. ASHURST. That may be, Mr. President, but nevertheless the Senate committee is convinced that the House committee was wrong, and I speak with great respect.

Mr. PHELAN. This is a corrective body.

Mr. LODGE. You will find the House rather difficult to correct in conference.

Mr. ASHURST. I will state to the Senator that this is a nonreservation boarding school.

Mr. LODGE. It is a boarding school?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. That explains it, in a large measure. I supposed it was a day school.

Mr. ASHURST. The Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs said before the House committee:

A number of the Indians holding allotments on the public domain are under the jurisdiction of the superintendent. The Indian population approximates 2,500; 100 pupils, the same number as last year, are contemplated to be provided for from the same amount of money, $18,400; $8,000 is estimated for repairs and improvements, including the purchase of land for a school farm.

I will ask leave to read further, as follows:

This school has no tillable land, except a small garden. It has to buy milk, meat, potatoes, hay, oats, and other feed for its horses and other stock. The purchase of land for a school farm is one thing most needed to make the Greenville School what it should be, both from an economical and educational standpoint.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, after line 8, to insert:

For the improvement and construction of roads and bridges on the Yuma Indian Reservation in California, $10,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended, reimbursable to the United States by the Indians having tribal rights on said reservation and to remain a charge and lien upon the lands and funds belonging to said Indians until paid.

Mr. CURTIS. I move to strike out, in line 12, commencing with the word "reimbursable," down to the word "paid," in line 15, the reimbursable feature. These roads and bridges will be just as much an accommodation to the white settlers, and the Indians have no funds whatever.

Mr. ASHURST. I hope the amendment to the amendment will be agreed to.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I move to strike out the words "and to remain available until expended."

Mr. ASHURST. I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Beginning with line 11, after "$10,000," strike out "to be immediately available and to remain available until expended," so that the paragraph will read:

For the improvement and construction of roads and bridges on the Yuma Indian Reservation in California, $10,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Florida," in section 4, page 29, line 19, after the word "education," to strike out "$8,000" and insert "including the purchase of such land as the Secretary of the Interior may deem proper, $5,000," so as to make section 4 read:

SEC. 4. For relief of distress among the Seminole Indians in Florida, and for purposes of their civilization and education, including the purchase of such land as the Secretary of the Interior may deem proper, $5,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this is a real shock to me. The committee has added the words "including the purchase of such land as the Secretary of the Interior may deem proper" and reduced the amount from $8,000 to $5,000. I suppose there is some good reason for it, but it is so unusual that really I should like to have an explanation.

Mr. CURTIS. Last year there was an unexpended balance of $2,000. The committee thought, and I think the assistant commissioner agreed with them, that with the unexpended balance of $2,000 and the $5,000 here appropriated the sum would be sufficient.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am glad to have some explanation of it. Neither of the Senators from Florida is on the floor to explain it to us, and I wanted some Senator to explain it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It is in line with the Democratic policy, of course.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is clearly demonstrated throughout this bill that Democratic economy has been exercised.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Idaho," in section 5, on page 30, line 2, after the word "system," to strike out "$25,000" and insert "$35,000," so as to make the clause read:

For improvement and maintenance and operation of the Fort Hall irrigation system, $35,000, reimbursable to the United States out of any funds of the Indians occupying the Fort Hall Reservation now or hereafter available.

Mr. GALLINGER. Democratic economy!

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Kansas," in section 6, on page 30, line 17, after "$12,500," to strike out "in all, $140,250" and insert "for barn, $8,000; in all, $148,250," so as to make the clause read:

For support and education of 750 Indian pupils at the Indian school, Haskell Institute, Lawrence, Kans., and for pay of superintendent, $127,750; for general repairs and improvements, $12,500; for barn, $8,000; in all, $148,250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, after line 22, to insert:

For the construction of bridges across Big Soldier Creek and Little Soldier Creek, within the Potawatomi Indian Reservation, Jackson County, Kans., $10,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be expended until the Secretary of the Interior shall have obtained from the proper authorities of the country of Jackson satisfactory guaranties of the payment by the said county of Jackson of at least one-half of the cost of said bridges, and that the said proper authorities of the said county of Jackson shall assume full responsibility for and will at all times maintain and repair said bridges: And provided further, That any and all expenses above the amount herein named in connection with the building and maintaining of said bridges shall be borne by the said county of Jackson.

Mr. LODGE. Now, in regard to this amendment, to which I have no objection whatever, I notice that there are 750 Indian pupils at the Haskell Institute. Is that a boarding school?

Mr. CURTIS. It is a boarding school.

Mr. LODGE. That costs a little over $160 per capita, the Bidwell School over $300, and others $279. So I was not wrong in saying the price was extremely high at the Greenville School. Here we have a boarding school to compare with it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Michigan," in section 8, on page 32, after line 3, to insert two paragraphs, and the Secretary read the first paragraph, as follows:

That the act of June 25, 1910, entitled "An act for the relief of the Saginaw, Swan Creek, and Black River Band of Chippewa Indians in the State of Michigan, and for other purposes," be, and hereby is, amended so as to read as follows: "That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, to consider and adjudicate any claim, arising under treaty stipulations or otherwise, which the Saginaw, Swan Creek, and Black River Band or other band of Chippewa Indians residing in the State of Michigan have against the United States; and such suit or suits as may be instituted hereunder shall, if the convenience of the court admit, be advanced upon the docket of either of said courts for trial, and be determined at the earliest practicable time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask the chairman of the committee how many such suits are there likely to be?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment has not been fully read. The remainder of the amendment will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 2. That upon the final determination of such suit or suits the Court of Claims shall decree such fees as the court shall find to be reasonable, to be paid to the attorney or attorneys employed by the said band of Indians, and the same shall be paid out of the sum found to be due said band of Indians when an appropriation therefor shall have been made by Congress: Provided, That in no case shall the fees decreed by the court exceed in amount such sum or sums as may have been fixed therefor under the terms of any contract entered into between the Indians and their attorney in conformity with section 2103 and the following of the Revised Statutes of the United States for the prosecution of their claim.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator having the bill in charge if he will not allow those two items to go over until to-morrow morning?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Which two?

Mr. SMOOT. The two just read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is one amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. It is one amendment. I mean both the paragraphs. I simply want to look it up.

Mr. ASHURST. I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. We will take it up the first thing in the morning. There may be no objection to it at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Before it goes over I should like to ask a question.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I would like to have it adopted and not go over.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to ask a question about it before it goes over. How many of those suits are there likely to be?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not know how many. There are not over two, as I recall it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not more than two suits will be brought under this provision?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I thought the Senator referred to the number of items in the bill similar to this one. There probably would be only one suit brought under this provision. This is a claim the Indians have against the Government under treaties. The claim is recognized by the department, and it has had some difficulty in arriving at the facts.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. How much is involved?

Mr. TOWNSEND. There is great dispute about that. It may reach as much as $150,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The reason why I made the inquiry was because it seems to imply that the suit may go to the Supreme Court of the United States. I feel anxious that we should not burden that court with small litigation.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not think it will reach that court.

Mr. ASHURST. Can we agree to the amendment this evening, and then I will ask that the bill be laid aside? Does the Senator from Utah want to have the amendment go over?

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that it may go over until to-morrow. We will commence with it the first thing when the bill is taken up to-morrow.

Mr. ASHURST. Then I ask that the bill be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is laid aside.

SELF-GOVERNMENT IN THE TROPICS (S. DOC. NO. 364).

Mr. CHILTON. I ask unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee on Printing, and I call the attention of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] to it. I report back without amendment the following resolution, and ask that it be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 142) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript submitted by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] on January 24, 1916, entitled "Self-Government in the Tropics," by Samuel L. Parrish, be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

THE NEW JURISPRUDENCE (S. DOC. NO. 365).

Mr. CHILTON, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution (S. Res. 143), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the manuscript submitted by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] on December 17, 1915, entitled "The New Jurisprudence," by Francis B. James, of Washington, D. C., be printed as a Senate document.

THE PETROLEUM RESOURCES (S. DOC. NO. 363).

Mr. CHILTON, from the Committee on Printing. I report the following resolution and ask that it be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 144) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript submitted by the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] on March 9, 1916, entitled "The Exhaustion of the Petroleum Resources of the United States," by Mark L. Requa, consulting engineer of the Bureau of Mines, be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. SMOOT. It was impossible for me to be in the Committee on Printing this morning. I had to attend a meeting of the Committee on Finance and also of the Committee on Appropriations. I wish to ask the Senator reporting the resolution if he examined as to whether this article had been printed in part or in whole by any department of the Government?

Mr. PHELAN. We examined that.

Mr. CHILTON. It is an original document.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I have no objection to the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

CENTRAL HEATING AND POWER PLANT.

Mr. CHILTON, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution (S. Res. 145), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the manuscripts submitted by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] on March 4 and 14, 1916, entitled "Proposed central heating, lighting, and power plant," be printed as a Senate document, with illustrations.

PARK SYSTEM OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. From the Committee on Printing I report favorably a concurrent resolution for which I ask present consideration.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 18) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 1,000 additional copies of Senate Report No. 166, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, entitled "The improvement of the park system of the District of Columbia," of which 500 shall be for the use of the Senate and 500 for the use of the House of Representatives.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 40 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 24, 1916, at 12 o'clock m.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate March 23, 1916.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 23, 1916.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou, who hast ever been a potent factor in shaping and guiding the affairs of men; in every crisis of the world's history Thou hast brought forth the man of the hour, who guided by the star of destiny as Moses was guided by the fiery, cloudy pillar when he led the children of Israel out of bondage into the promised land, we most fervently pray that Thou wilt bring forth the man of the hour in the present crisis which not only touches every home in the war zone but affects the peoples of all the world, that he may move the minds and hearts of those who are responsible for the terrible conflict and guide them to a peaceful solution of their problems; and God grant that a world-wide peace may obtain forever and aye. And everlasting praise shall be Thine in the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE COLUMBUS RAID.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from Marcus M. Marshall, giving an account of Villa's raid on Columbus, which is vouched for by the New York Times.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from Marcus M. Marshall touching the Villa raid on Columbus. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4876. An act to provide for an increase in the number of cadets at the United States Military Academy.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the conference reports on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to bills of the following titles:

H. R. 8493. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 10037. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

H. R. 11078. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 4876. An act to provide for an increase in the number of cadets at the United States Military Academy; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12766.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. GARRETT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12766) to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I understand that a point of order is pending against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN], and I would like to have that disposed of first.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a point of order pending on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to send to the desk and have read another draft of the amendment that I presented. There were some slight errors in the hurried draft of the other.

Mr. HAY. I did not quite understand the gentleman.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN. I want to offer another amendment in lieu of this one, to correct a few slight errors that were made on account of the hurried manner in which the amendment was drafted.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to withdraw his other amendment?

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the other amendment and submit this.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's withdrawing his amendment?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 52, line 10, at the end of the line add the following:

"And provided further, That no part of any appropriation made under or by virtue of this act after the year 1920 shall be had for the purpose of compensating any organization of the National Guard, or any of the officers or enlisted men thereof, in any State or Territory which shall by law or otherwise provide for or permit the use of the National Guard, or any part thereof, in connection with any strike of employees of any railroad, mine, or factory, who shall strike for the purpose of obtaining an increase of wages or a change of terms or condition of employment."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I renew my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. KEATING). The determination of this point of order will go over until after the hour's debate upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 75 and insert the following:

"SEC. 75. The Volunteer Army. The President is hereby authorized, at any time, to organize, maintain, and train, under the provisions of sections 3 to 12, both inclusive, of an act entitled 'An act to provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war,' approved April 25, 1914, volunteer forces, not exceeding an average of 600 officers and enlisted men for each congressional district. The term of enlistment, which shall in no event be greater than that of the Regular Army, the period of service with the colors and with the reserve, and the period of training shall be as the President may prescribe, those passing to the reserve to have the status and obligations prescribed for reserves of the Regular Army. Officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces raised under the provisions of this section shall be entitled to the pay and allowances of officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades in the Regular Army during periods of training only.

"Temporary appointments and promotions of officers of the Regular Army arising from the operation of this section may be terminated at the discretion of the President.

"Officers of the Regular Army who receive commissions in the Volunteer Army herein authorized shall in time of peace receive the pay and allowances of their respective grades in the Regular Army, and no more."

The CHAIRMAN. Under the agreement made before the House adjourned yesterday, debate on this amendment is limited to one hour—30 minutes of which is to be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] and 30 minutes by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, practically all military authorities agree that if our fleet should be bottled up or defeated we should need 500,000 completely trained soldiers to stop the rush of invasion until partially trained or untrained troops could be got into condition. Now, the question is, Where are these 500,000 fully trained men to come from? In the bill I introduced sometime ago, which contained the War College plan, it was provided that these men were to be drawn from a fairly good-sized Regular Army and from a force of former Regulars known as the reserve of the Regular Army. On the other hand, Secretary Garrison felt that our first line ought to be made up of the available field force of a small Regular Army of 135,000 men, a continental army of 400,000 partially trained men to make up the balance.

The theory of the Hay bill, which we are now considering, is that our first line of Army defense should be composed of the available field force of a Regular Army of 140,000 men, together with 60,000 Regular reservists, the balance to be drawn from the partially trained men of the National Guard, federalized, so far as is possible to federalize the National Guard, under the Constitution of the United States.

Now, recognizing the fact, as I do, that it is impossible in the present Congress to secure a Regular Army large enough, with its reserves, to produce ultimately a first line of 500,000 fully trained men, I have introduced, as an amendment to this bill, paragraph 56 of the Chamberlain Senate Army bill. This paragraph provides for a national or Federal militia or Volunteer Army, as Senator CHAMBERLAIN calls it. This Volunteer Army is to be partially trained in time of peace, so that in time of war it may, with such Regulars as we may be able to get together, make up the first line of defense should our Navy be bottled up or swept out of the way. Of course, it must not be forgotten that a great part of our Regular Army will be used up in manning our coast fortifications and in our overseas garrisons.

There are two kinds of armed citizenry contemplated by the Constitution. One of them is the kind of armed citizenry known at present as the National Guard or State militia. It is national only in name. It is organized under authority of what is known as the militia clause of the Constitution. The other kind of armed citizenry is the force which in time of war is known as the Volunteer Army. Volunteer armies are organized under that clause of the Constitution of the United States which grants to Congress the power to raise armies. My amendment strikes out the section of the Hay bill which proposes that the National Government shall pay the separate National Guards of all the States, the 48 little armies, as they are sometimes called. Instead, my amendment provides for the creation of a real Federal national militia or guard, to be controlled from top to toe by Uncle Sam alone.

The Hay bill proposes that we shall raise our citizen army under the militia clause of the Constitution. One of the principal objects to be gained by that step is that an armed body raised under the militia clause is, in Chairman HAY's opinion, capable of performing two separate functions, one of them a State function and one of them a national function.

State militia or National Guards, as we call them, may be used either as a State constabulary or as part of the National Army in the event of war; but hitherto, before National Guardsmen could be used outside the limits of the United States, it was necessary for them to volunteer as individuals for national service. This is what happened at the outbreak of the War with Spain. The Hay bill seeks to overcome this difficulty by providing that National Guardsmen are to be drafted into the national service in case of war.

If you adopt the principle contained in my amendment, you will base your citizen army on the other clause of the Constitution, to wit, the clause which gives Congress the power to raise armies. In that case the national militia or Volunteer Army, as it is called in the Chamberlain amendment, which I have just offered, will be organized to serve a single purpose. It will not be possible to use it as a constabulary in time of peace, but simply and solely as a Federal force in case of war. The advantage is that there will be no training by State authorities, no police duty to perform, no local politics in the choice of officers, and no necessity for a draft in time of war. From first to last the citizen army will be under Uncle Sam and under Uncle Sam alone.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. The clause of the Constitution which the gentleman has quoted follows the one authorizing Congress to declare war, does it not?

Mr. GARDNER. I do not recollect. Mr. Chairman, whether you organize your citizen force under the Hay bill, which we will call the proposition for near federalizing the National Guard, or whether you organize your citizen force under the Chamberlain amendment, which provides for a straight-out Federal militia, in either case you will not destroy the territorial units of our present so-called National Guard. In the course of a short while, whichever way our secondary Army is organized, practically the same individual men and practically the same individual officers will be included in the force. The difference will be this: Take my old regiment, for instance. Organized under the Hay bill it would probably be known as the Eighth Infantry, Massachusetts Militia, or Eighth Infantry, Massachusetts National Guard. On the other hand, organized under the Chamberlain amendment for a volunteer army, the regiment would be known as the Eighth Massachusetts Infantry. This is the same distinction which was made in the Spanish War when a regiment passed from the status of a militia regiment to the status of United States Volunteers. This amendment which I am offering would ultimately, if it became law, give us a citizen army of 261,000 men. Under its terms the President would be given entire control so that he might annually require the troops to train for one week or for two weeks or for a month. He would have the power to order this volunteer army to be trained entirely out of doors or partially in doors. In fact, if such a force were now in existence, the President could at once order it into Mexico to maintain the line of communication for the Regular troops which now are there.

All through our history there has been a divided control over our militia. When war has come upon us both the Nation and the various States have claimed jurisdiction. When Uncle Sam has given to the militia the order, "Forward, march," it has too often been the case that the States or the militiamen themselves have cried "Halt!" Such was notably the case in the War of 1812, and, to some extent, even in the Spanish-American War. I am not prepared to say that we can enlist 261,000 citizen soldiers either under this Chamberlain amendment or under any other system; that is to say, I am by no means sure that in the near future we shall find 261,000 citizens willing to sacrifice the time required for a complete course of training. I myself believe in a Regular Army of 250,000 to 300,000 men, and I believe in compulsory military training for the youth of this land, so that when war comes our Volunteers may be trained Volunteers instead of raw recruits. Recognizing, however, that at present it is necessary to make an attempt at organizing a citizen soldiery without any form of compulsion, I am anxious that that citizen soldiery shall be absolutely severed from State control.

Recently we passed legislation increasing our Regular Army by 20,000. Unfortunately, the young men of the country are betraying no anxiety to enlist for the purpose of filling those vacancies. We are told, however, that all over the land National Guardsmen are straining at the leash to go to Mexico. Mr. Chairman, I doubt it. I confess that if I were a member of the National Guard I myself should not be any too anxious to take part in such a dreary task. I very much doubt whether our National Guardsmen are straining at the leash to be sent into the cactus bushes of Mexico. If so, they have only to enlist in the Regular Army and, if they can really boast of any adequate training, they will speedily find themselves on the line of communications in Mexico.

If Congress were to pass this amendment of mine—or, rather, Senator CHAMBERLAIN'S—here is what I should advocate in time of peril or exigency: I should grant to the President of the United States the power to pay bounties to get those national volunteers. That reminds me that I have here some figures in the matter of bounties paid during the Civil War.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] on March 21 presented us with figures prepared by the Commissioner of Pensions, Mr. G. M. Saltzgaber, estimating that there were about 2,213,365 different individuals who enlisted in the Northern Army in the Civil War. Of course the total Union enlistments ran a good deal higher than that in actual numbers, because in many cases there were reenlistments. Livermore, in "Numbers and Losses in the Civil War in America," reckons the total Union enlistments, counting duplicates, at 2,898,304. I hold in my had a letter from The Adjutant General, which shows that out of those soldiers in the Northern Army in the Civil War no less than 1,722,690 received a bounty from the United States, without reckoning the State and local bounties. The amount of bounty paid out by the United States was $300,223,500. Here is the letter:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, December 4, 1915.

Hon. A. P. GARDNER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: In further response to your letter of the 27th ultimo, in which you request to be furnished with any information which would indicate the numbers of northern and southern soldiers who received pecuniary inducements to enlist, either in the form of national bounties, State bounties, or substitute money, and of the number of men who were drafted to serve as soldiers, the number who responded to the draft, and the number who furnished substitutes, I am directed by the Secretary of War to submit for your information the following statement:

SOLDIERS OF THE UNITED STATES ARMY—NATIONAL BOUNTIES.

In an estimate of the number of men to whom United States bounty has been paid from May 3, 1861, to the end of the war, printed in the final report of the Provost Marshal General (Ex. Doc. No. 1, House of Representatives, 39th Cong., 1st sess., vol. 4), the total number of such men is given as 1,722,690 and the total amount of bounty paid to them as $300,223,500.

STATE AND LOCAL BOUNTIES.

This department has no data regarding State and local bounties prior to 1863. Such information as the department has been able to obtain from the State and local authorities on the subject is contained in the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Armies, series 111, volume 5, pages 740–749.

DRAFTED MEN AND SUBSTITUTES.

The records show that the number of men drafted from the States and Territories during the Civil War under the enrollment act of March 3, 1863, was 776,829, and that this number is accounted for as follows:

Failed to report	161,244
Discharged, quota full	46,101
Discharged by order	47,297
Exempted	315,509
Furnished substitutes	73,607
Paid commutation	86,724
Held to service	46,347

It appears from the above table that 73,607 substitutes were furnished by persons drafted in the Civil War, but no data are in the possession of the department showing the amounts paid to these substitutes.

SOLDIERS OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES ARMY.

Such information as is in the possession of the department in regard to bounties paid to Confederate soldiers has been published in the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Armies, Series IV, Volume I, pages 825–827, 903, 944, and 1096; Volume II, page 205; Volume III, pages 184 and 1000. From what is there shown it appears that a bounty of $50 was provided for in an act of the Confederate Congress, approved December 11, 1861, and that in another act approved February 17, 1864, it was provided that at the expiration of six months from April 1, 1864, a bounty of $100 in 6 per cent Confederate Government bonds was to be paid to every enlisted man then in service, or, in case of his death previous to such payment, to his legal heirs.

The publications hereinbefore referred to are no doubt readily accessible to you in the Library of Congress.

Very respectfully,
HENRY P. MCCAIN,
The Adjutant General.

My objection to the Hay plan of building up a national citizen army upon the basis of the National Guard, under the militia clause of the Constitution, is that it results in two great handicaps to efficiency. One of them is the divided control, and the other is the constitutional limitation on the use of the citizen army so organized. The divided control results from the fact that the Constitution reserves to the States the right to choose the officers for the militia, and also reserves to the States the right to train the militia under regulations to be prescribed by Congress. Moreover, in times of peace a National Guard made up of the so-called federalized National Guard of the 48 different States will be commanded by 48 different governors, and must therefore consist of 48 different armies. So much for divided control.

Now, as to the limitations on the uses to which the militia may be put in case the Nation seeks to use it in time of danger or stress.

Under the Constitution the Congress of the United States can call out the militia to suppress insurrections, to execute the laws of the United States, and to repel invasions; but the Constitution gives us no power to call out that militia to invade a foreign country, such as Mexico or Canada or Cuba. The Hay bill ingeniously endeavors to obviate that constitutional difficulty of divided control and also that constitutional difficulty of limited use. I shall explain all that presently; but, first, I wish to say a word about the results of divided control and limited use in the past. Probably you all know that in the Revolution it was very hard to get volunteers to serve outside the States from which they came, but in the war of 1812 matters came to a head. I am sorry to say that my own State of Massachusetts and the State of Connecticut behaved in a highly hyphenated way. They would not, either of them, furnish troops to fill their quota to fight Great Britain. Subsequently the governor of Vermont did not make as bad a showing, but the individual soldiers of Vermont crossed Lake Champlain and took part in the fighting. The militia of various States on several different occasions, when ordered to invade Canada, refused to do so, resting on their constitutional rights. I shall insert in the RECORD three articles written by former Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson. The articles deal with the Hay bill. In article No. 3 appears a detailed statement of these refusals on the part of our militiamen to cross the Canadian border in the War of 1812.

Now, of course, the Hay bill undertakes, as much of our legislation has undertaken in the past, to obviate the difficulties arising from the conflict between National and State control of our militia. The framers of the Hay bill feel that a refusal of the militia to obey orders will never occur again, because they have inserted a provision directing a draft of these militiamen into the service of the United States in the event of war.

Now, I think that many good lawyers believe this particular feature of the Hay bill is constitutional. That is a good deal more than can be said about the other features of the bill which undertake to obviate the difficulties arising from divided control in time of peace. Be that as it may, when Uncle Sam gives the order to march in time of war it is a little late in the day to decide constitutional questions. I should a good deal rather have an Army of trained citizens whose constitutional status was not a subject of controversy. That is why I introduced the Chamberlain amendment.

When Uncle Sam wants troops in time of war, I do not want his summons to the colors to be answered by an alibi and a search warrant or by a mandamus or by quo warranto proceedings, or whatever the legal processes are—not being a lawyer I do not know. As to the training of militia in time of peace, that is still left with the States under the Hay plan for near federalization. To be sure, it is left to the States under such regulation as the Nation may lay down; but nevertheless the responsibility rests with 48 different States. I admit that in the Hay bill there are provisions which are intended to make it impossible for a State to select an unfit officer; but there is necessarily a very great latitude in determining the fitness of an officer. It can not always be ascertained by a written examination. The framers of this bill hope to compel efficiency by the power of the pocketbook. By money payments they expect to force the various States of the Union to drill, discipline, and maintain their troops in accordance with the ideas of the National Government as to how a citizen army ought to be drilled, disciplined, and maintained. This bill, in effect, says to the 48 States: "We will not pay you a single cent if you do not come up to the national standard which we shall set for you." I do not believe that any such plan will prove effective so long as the commander in chief of each one of these small armies is a different governor and so long as all the officers are State controlled.

Uncle Sam may scold, Uncle Sam may threaten to fine, he may, as a last resort, order that some State shall be deprived of ordnance or of artillery or of military supplies of some sort. How many of us who have had practical experience of Uncle Sam's relations with the various States honestly believe that those threats will be carried out?

If Uncle Sam really started to punish your State or mine, Mr. Chairman, how quickly we should start a scramble to prevent our States undergoing treatment which probably they might richly deserve. The proof of all this is that to-day, in spite of all our laws designed to bring up the standard of our citizen soldiery, there are only eight States in the Union which have anywhere nearly an efficient National Guard.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 20 minutes.

Mr. GARDNER. I have 10 minutes which I desire to yield to other gentlemen.

The articles by former Secretary of War Stimson which I desire to incorporate are as follows:

[From the New York Times, Mar. 20, 1916.]

H. L. STIMSON ANALYZES THE ARMY BILLS—THE ADDITIONS TO OUR LAND FORCES NOW BEING CONSIDERED BY THE SENATE AND HOUSE.

[By Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of War in President Taft's Cabinet.]

(First article.)

MARCH 15, 1916.

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

You have courteously asked me for an expression of my views in regard to the military bills now pending before Congress. I am glad to comply, although any such expression must necessarily deal only with the salient points of a very complicated mass of proposed legislation.

At no time since the beginning of the Government has there been such fundamental and general overhauling among thinking people throughout the world of the postulates of military system and policy. The great European war has driven home to us even in America the fact that the last half century has completely revolutionized national methods of making war. As a consequence the foundations of our own policy have been submitted to a scrutiny and criticism which they probably have not received before, even in the stress of our own wars.

Unfortunately, the effect of this has been manifested in Congress later and less thoroughly than among the people of our Atlantic seaboard, and thus, though the pending bills show the beneficial results of the agitation, it has not been sufficient to save us from some fundamental errors.

AS TO THE REGULAR ARMY.

So far as the Regular Army is concerned, the agitation for preparedness has had on the whole gratifying results. Mr. HAY, of the House, who originally proposed to add no new regimental units in the Army, but merely to raise the number of enlisted men in the existing regiments, has now reported a bill which contains increases substantially corresponding with Secretary Garrison's recommendations. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Senate, goes much further and reports a bill which presents substantially the increase recommended by the General Staff. If the House bill becomes law, we shall have 10 new regiments of infantry and 6 new regiments of field artillery, besides 15 new companies of engineers and 52 new companies of coast artillery. If the Senate bill becomes law, we shall have 34 new regiments of infantry, 10 new regiments of cavalry, and 15 new regiments of field artillery, besides 92 additional companies of coast artillery and 6 entirely new regiments of engineers. Mr. HAY'S bill would give us, within the continental United States, three Infantry divisions and one Cavalry division, besides an additional Cavalry brigade. This is the same number of tactical organizations which we have at present, but our present divisions are partly skeletonized and lack the requisite number of regiments to make them complete. Mr. HAY'S additions would complete them.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S bill would give us, within the United States, four Infantry divisions and two Cavalry divisions. A fair argument can be made for each of these propositions. Having in mind merely the military needs of the country, preference should be given without hesitation to the larger proposal. The Regular Army under both plans is to be our first line of defense, and in our rapidly growing country a mobile force inside the United States of four divisions of Infantry and two divisions of Cavalry, of from 100,000 to 140,000 men, according as the units are at peace or war strength, is certainly none too large for that purpose.

The reasons which are cited against the larger and in favor of the smaller proposal are, first, the supposed impossibility of recruiting under our voluntary system the additional men neecssary for Senator CHAMBERLAIN'S proposal, and, second, the fact that we have not in existence sufficient accommodations in our posts for such a number and that the cost of building such accommodations would be very great. The Senate bill proposes to meet the first of these difficulties by changing our faulty enlistment law so as to permit men to be furloughed into the reserve after two years' service, or even after one year in the case of such men as are reported as proficient and sufficiently trained by their company commanders. Our present law requires a maximum of four years and a minimum of three years with the colors before they can be so furloughed. Experiments have been made with provisional companies, troops, and batteries of the Regular Army which have indicated that not only can the men be sufficiently trained within the shorter period but that there can be developed in this way a much greater interest and stimulus among both the men and their officers. Most of our progressive officers believe that under such a system of reward for proficiency and good conduct the Regular Army might be made to appeal to a class of men which it does not now reach, and that enlistments would be very greatly increased if these better men felt that by applying themselves diligently they could get the requisite training and an honorable discharge after a year's service. I have long been of that opinion myself, and I believe that this is one of the strong points in favor of the Senate bill.

So far as the difficulties of housing the Army are concerned I am inclined to think that this could be made a blessing in disguise. It would make it necessary for us to devise a system of housing large masses of troops in cantonments instead of supporting them at many small and expensive posts. We faced just such a problem when we mobilized a division on the Mexican border at Galveston, in 1913, and we solved it with fair satisfaction and with comparatively little expense. Although placed in a very uncomfortable situation, owing to the military exigencies of the mobilization, the men and officers built their own cantonments, and the bulk of them have remained on the border ever since.

If we had to face the problem of housing an additional division or two of troops it would necessarily force us to house them in a more practical and less expensive way than at present. And it would result, in my opinion, in the new units being kept together instead of scattered. This would be an incalculable advantage from the military standpoints of training, discipline, and usefulness.

RESERVE OFFICERS.

One of the great needs which have been made clear by the public discussion of military matters of the last year has been our shortage of officers and the necessity of establishing a system of reserve officers upon which the President can call in case of war, both to take junior positions in the Regular Army and to help officer the volunteer, or citizen army, upon which the Nation must rely in any serious emergency. Both the Senate and the House bills have provisions for establishing such a reserve officers' corps, but each follows a different method. The Senate bill provides for the organization of courses at our universities and colleges and other educational institutions at which students may receive either elective or compulsory instruction in military training under officers of the Army detailed as professors of military science and tactics.

It then provides for reserve officers' training camps, where such students can receive further training out of doors, and finally provides for temporary commissions as second lieutenants in the Regular Army, by which such reserve officers can be given practical instruction in that best of all schools—the Regular Army—for a period not exceeding six months.

The House bill, on the other hand, provides for the establishment of 30 cadet companies to be attached to the various branches of the Army, in each of which from 50 to 100 cadets, between the ages of 20 and 27 years, and recruited from officers of the National Guard and graduates of educuational institutions to which Regular officers are detailed to give instruction, can receive a year's training, after which they at once become members of the officers' reserve corps.

While it is, perhaps, a fair matter of argument as to the merits of either system, I am personally inclined to the belief that more satisfactory results will be obtained through the Senate program. It seems to me that it will appeal to a more broadly and better-educated class of men, and that it will permit more intensive as well as more flexible training. A member of a cadet company who is trained for a year straight in such a company must necessarily spend a large part of that year in garrison or posts where much of the duty to be performed is mechanical and a matter of routine. While it is important that every officer should be thoroughly grounded in such duties it is also true that with the class of men which we should hope to get as reserve officers the time spent in such routine and garrison duty need not be nearly so long as is necessary to train recruits of a less intelligent class. It is much more important that we should get for our reserve officers a class of men who not only have the capacity for the higher branches of study which are now so necessary in modern warfare but who have spent a requisite amount of time on such matters rather than on mere garrison drill.

Finally, the chance of serving for six months as an officer in the Regular Army, which is provided by the Senate bill, will give a training in responsibility to a serious and ambitious man which service in a cadet company could not possibly do.

The foregoing, I think, are the most salient provisions of the bill, so far as they concern the Regular Army. There are other features in each bill which are of great importance, but for the most part they are not matters of general interest. The Senate bill provides for a tactical organization by brigades and divisions. It increases the number of the General Staff, and provides for additional general officers of the line. These are all good provisions. On the other hand, the numbers which it prescribes for certain units, particularly in the case of machine-gun companies and troops, are much below those indicated as necessary by the experience of the European war, and in this respect the Senate bill is inferior to the House bill. On the other hand, the House bill, in providing for admission to the Regular Army of new officers of the grade of second lieutenants, gives a preference to officers of the National Guard over enlisted men of the Regular Army and members of the officers' reserve corps. This is a reversal of the present law, and I do not believe it is just to the enlisted men in the Army. Under the House bill enlisted men are also required to take examinations for commissions, while no such requirement seems to be exacted of officers of the National Guard. As a rule, candidates for a commission who have served an enlistment in the Regular Army are better grounded in the rudiments of the training necessary for a junior officer than are officers of the National Guard. As the bill now stands it would be quite possible for a man to obtain an election as an officer of a National Guard organization and then to enter the Army practically without examination, taking precedence over specially qualified enlisted candidates and over members of the officers' reserve corps. I think this is unsound, and would tend to break down the provisions for officers' training, which the bill in other portions seeks to establish.

The House bill also contains some provisions, particularly in section 8, which will tend to narrow and restrict the wise system of detail in the staff departments and would thus tend to a reversion to the system of permanent departmental staffs which existed before the Spanish War and which was terminated by the reforms of Secretary Root.

Taken as a whole, therefore, the general treatment of the Regular Army and its problems by both bills is an improvement over existing legislation and would tend to give us a larger and better Regular Army than we could have expected a little while ago. Provisions of the Senate bill follow much more closely the recommendations and views of our military advisers, the General Staff, and that bill, while far from perfect, is consequently more free from imperfections than the other.

THE PROPOSALS TO "FEDERALIZE" THE MILITIA—WHEREIN THE BILLS BEFORE THE SENATE AND HOUSE FAIL TO PROVIDE THE MEASURE OF DEFENSE NEEDED.

[By Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of War in President Taft's Cabinet.]

(Second article.)

NEW YORK, March 17, 1916.

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

In my previous letter I discussed the provisions of the bills pending before Congress relating to the Regular Army. What I regard as the most serious and dangerous provisions in the proposed legislation are found in the remaining portions of the bills which relate to our citizen soldiery. This is also the most important part of the program of national defense. The function of the Regular Army in the scheme of national defense is narrow. It is the nucleus and pattern with the aid of which we are to train our citizen soldiers, and it is to serve as the meager first line to delay and hold off an invasion while the citizen forces are mobilizing. The ultimate safety of the country has always depended and must in future depend upon the efforts of men who are not professionals, but citizens leaving civil pursuits to serve their country in time of war.

Our Federal Constitution provides clearly for two classes of soldiery—the one national and the other local; the one organized and controlled exclusively by the National Government, the other primarily a force which belongs to the separate States, although it is subject to national use under certain conditions. The power to raise national forces is broad enough to include all kinds of soldiery, both professional and citizen. Under it we support our Regular Army and under it, in nearly all our wars, we have raised forces of citizen soldiers either as volunteers or under the draft. Gen. Upton, our foremost military writer, speaks of this constitutional authority as "unqualified" and as giving "every war power that the most despotic ruler could ask."

On the other hand, the authority given by the Constitution over the local forces or militia of the several States is narrow and restricted. They can only be called into the service of the General Government for three purposes, namely, "to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." Congress has power only to enact the general statutes providing for their organization, arms, and discipline, while to the States is intrusted the administration of such statutes and to the States is reserved expressly the power of appointing the officers and training the men While the President is the Commander in Chief of our national forces at all times under the Constitution, he commands the militia only when "called into the actual service of the United States."

This distinction between local and national forces goes back to the very beginning of the Government, and as the country has grown larger the necessity for the distinction has grown more acute. There have always been men in the country who while they could and would serve for home defense nevertheless found it a great hardship, owing to their business or domestic ties, to undertake to serve anywhere and under all conditions. On the other hand, there always have been other men, usually younger, to whom the distinction was of no such importance. I think it is safe to say that to-day, when the New York Militia are confronted with the possibility of being sent 2,000 miles away to the Rio Grande, this old question presents itself to the various men of those organizations in quite as sharp colors as it did in the Revolution, when the militia of New England was reluctant to serve in New York and Washington was writing to Joseph Reed of the "desire of retiring into a chimney corner" which had "seized the troops of New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts."

The very training of our militia has taken on a character suited for home-defense troops with domestic ties rather than for national troops. We drill them at night once a week in the armory, instead of sending them out into the field for several months of consecutive, intensive training, and have thus adopted a way which is the least effective method of teaching a man to be a soldier.

Now, the European war has suddenly brought us face to face with the fact that we must have a national force of citizen soldiery, trained in time of peace to stand behind the Regular Army in time of war, whenever and wherever it may be needed. We have suddenly learned that the progress of military science makes it impossible for us any longer to wait until the outbreak of war before we begin to train and discipline such a citizen army. At the same time the experience of our young men in the students' and business men's camps has shown that there are thousands of Americans outside of the militia ready to make the sacrifice necessary for such preparation, and that, under the conditions of intensive training in the field and under the guidance of Regular officers, they can make greater progress in learning how to be soldiers in even one month than they can in three years of weekly armory drills in the militia.

Under these circumstances the natural and constitutional method to follow would clearly seem to be to establish a force of national volunteers under the national powers of the Constitution, leaving it free for such units of the National Guard as may desire to do so to transfer themselves from the militia to this new force, while the others, composed perhaps of a different class of men, retain their old status of militia and play their old part as a home defense.

There ought to be no real antagonism between these two classes of citizen soldiery, and I do not believe there would be. Each would have a separate and an honorable part to play in the scheme of national defense, and each could do it without either straining the Constitution or disrupting the occupations of their respective members. The men who were young and foot free would naturally go into the national soldiery; the men who were older and more tied down would remain in the militia.

Instead, however, of taking this apparently simple and natural course, both the Senate and House bills contain elaborate provisions aimed to "federalize" the militia.

By this it is proposed that we shall still retain them as militia, and yet will try to increase the power of the Federal Government over them, so that we can use them as first-line national forces.

In their attempt to do this it is inevitable that the authors have inserted many provisions whose constitutionality—to put it most mildly—is very doubtful. The whole effort is an attempt to give the central Government an authority over the militia which it has not been hitherto believed to have.

But for the purpose of this discussion I shall not argue any of these doubtful question, but shall only endeavor to point out that under the restrictions of the Constitution, which are admitted and clear, such an attempt will be a failure in its results from a military standpoint. It will not provide the measure of national defense which, in this year of grace 1916, we are all aiming to get.

The two perfectly clear limitations which the Constitution puts upon the use of these State troops by the central Government are, first, that they can only be used by the Federal Government for the three purposes above mentioned, and, second, that they are under the direct command and control of the President only in time of war after they have been called into the service of the United States; that in other times they are under the command of the governors of the separate States. These two limitations, divided control and limited use, are violative of the first principles of military efficiency as applied to a national army. We do not have to speculate about this or to argue from the experience of other nations. We have tried it ourselves in our own history under the same Constitution and with the same divided control over our militia with results so disastrous that it seems inconceivable that we should want to make such a system the keystone of our arch of national defense. We tried to fight the war of 1812 in a large part with militia, and it was the most disastrous war in our history. On April 10, 1812, Congress authorized the President to call upon the governors of the States for 80,000 militia. The war of 1812 against England was unpopular in New England—just as a war here against any one of the European nations would be unpopular in certain parts of the country. The governors of Massachusetts and Connecticut refused to furnish their quota or to obey the President's call. They were backed up in this by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, which held that the State authorities and not the President were to judge whether the exigency requiring the services of these militia existed. A quarter of a century later the Supreme Court of the United States decided this question contrary to the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, but that was a matter of cold comfort when an enemy was threatening and the troops were needed. The same practical difficulty would exist to-day in case the authorities of any State refused. What is needed under such circumstances is not a lawsuit or a writ of mandamus, but the undisputed authority of a single commander in chief to order the men to obey on the pain of death, and no such power exists in the President of the United States over militia troops which are not yet in his service.

In September, 1814, a British force invaded New York and began an attack on Plattsburg. The American commander, Gen. Macomb, called upon the governor of Vermont to send troops to his assistance from across the lake. This governor, Martin Chittenden, was an opponent of the war. He declined to comply. The Vermont militia were anxious to go to the help of their compatriots but could get no order to do so. In the language of the historian Ingersoll:

"An officer of the militia, Gen. Newell, tendered his brigade to the governor to repair to Plattsburg or anywhere else to oppose the enemy, to which the governor's cold-blooded answer was that he had no authority to order the militia to leave the State. On the 6th day of September the cannonade then begun was distinctly audible at Burlington and at Gov. Chittenden's residence at Jericho. But housed and recreant there, the chief magistrate still held off when the people on their own spontaneous motion in numbers crossed the lake and following the cannonade hurried to Plattsburg without distinction of party to tender their services for their country."

Unfortunately the militia were not always as patriotic as these men of Vermont. On October 13, 1812, Gen. Van Rensselaer had assembled a force consisting of about 900 Regulars and 2,270 militia on the New York side of the Niagara River for the purpose of attacking a British fort across the river on Queenstown Heights. Early in the morning he sent over the Regulars and a few of the militia to surprise the British. The attack was completely successful and the Americans took possession of the fort. Later in the day the British commander assembled reenforcements and began an attempt to retake it from the Americans. Gen. Van Rensselaer then sought to bring over the rest of his force to the rescue of the sorely beset advance guard; but in the language of Gen. Upton:

"The rest of the militia on our side of the river, although ordered and implored by their commander, absolutely refused to cross over under the plea that, according to the Constitution of the United States, they could only be called out to resist an invasion."

During the rest of that day these men stayed on the bank on the American side and watched their comrades driven out of the fort, down to the river's bank, until they were killed or captured to the last man. Gen. Van Rensselaer, in his report of the action, said:

"I can only add that the victory was really won, but lost for the want of a small reenforcement; one-third part of the idle men might have saved all."

In precisely the same way during the same year a body of Ohio militia refused Gen. Hull's order to cross the boundary at Detroit, "alleging as a reason that they were not obliged to serve outside of the United States." Still another force of militia under Gen. Dearborn refused to cross the line at Plattsburg for the same reason, and still another force acted in the same way under Gen. Smyth.

It is idle to say that such things could not happen to us to-day. These incidents were not the result of chance; they were the fruits of faulty methods. American soldiers in 1812 were no less brave and patriotic than they are to-day. The American people to-day contain within them many more discordant elements they they did a century ago, and the governors of our States in the twentieth century will be quite as quick to listen to local political considerations as those New England governors were during the War of 1812. Indeed, it was less than two years ago when the governor of South Carolina disbanded his entire militia force in order to block the attempts of the National Government to restore discipline out of chaos in those South Carolina militia. It is as true to-day as when Washington was writing from Valley Forge that the safety of this country as a Nation can only be maintained by national forces under undivided national control.

In my next letter I shall endeavor to discuss in more detail how the provisions of the pending bills have failed to meet this national requirement.

THE WAY TO A REAL ARMY OF CITIZENS—ONE SECTION OF THE SENATE BILL OFFERS AN OPPORTUNITY NOT FOUND IN THE "FEDERALIZATION" OF THE MILITIA.

[By Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of War in President Taft's Cabinet.]

(Third and last article.)

NEW YORK, March 20, 1916.

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

In my last letter I discussed the attempt of the House and Senate bills to "federalize" the militia from the standpoint of our military experience in the War of 1812. I pointed out that the experience of that war conclusively demonstrated the weakness of the system of divided control and of limited use under which our militia is placed by the Federal Constitution. I tried to point out how such a force under such divided control inevitably broke down in time of war.

This defect of divided control can be demonstrated to be as fatal to the development of the numbers and efficiency of a national force in time of peace as the experience of 1812 showed it to be fatal to the fighting ability of such a force in time of war. The underlying proposition of both the bills proposed in the Senate and the House is that the Federal Government shall purchase the authority over these State troops which the Constitution has failed to give it as an original right. The authors of these bills apparently recognize, as indeed they must, that the power of the President to command the militia is limited by the second section of Article II of the Constitution to those times when they are "called into actual service of the United States," and that by Article I, section 8, there is reserved to the States the "authority" to "train the militia" in time of peace as well as to appoint the officers. The bills therefore provide a system of payments from the Federal Treasury. It is then argued that, although the President can not compel obedience to his orders to the State troops in time of peace by force, he can, by withholding these appropriations from the Federal Treasury, purchase their obedience and discipline.

This would be considered a singular doctrine among the students of military science in other countries. And yet, singular as it is, there are already in existence precedents in our own experience which will demonstrate its foredoomed failure here with almost mathematical certainty.

We judge our success in the development of a national force of volunteers by their readiness to enlist and their resulting numbers on the one side, and by their efficiency and discipline on the other. Our own experience with the method of Federal payments to the militia has already demonstrated that it is a failure in both of these directions.

In 1903, under the Dick law, we instituted the policy of making payments to the National Guard for the purpose of recruiting up its numbers and improving its discipline. These appropriations covered not only arms, ammunition, and supplies, but pay, subsistence, transportation for the men during their maneuvers in the field, and also aid to the various State encampments as well as to the joint maneuvers. Beginning with appropriations aggregating about two and a half millions a year, they were steadily increased until we are now paying six millions a year to the militia. Simultaneously the numbers of the guard have diminished, in comparison with the population of the country. Money has failed to give us numbers. In 1903 the National Guard consisted of 116,542 officers and men. In 1915 it consisted of 129,398 officers and men. The population of the country by the census of 1900 was less than 76,000,000. In 1915 it is reported as over 100,000,000.

In respect to efficiency and discipline I take the following from the official reports: In 1915, 564 officers and 19,382 men were absent from the annual inspection. During the year 1914 the average number of men absent from each weekly drill of instruction was 63,201, or nearly 50 per cent of the entire strength of the Organized Militia. The amended Dick law required the attendance on the part of the men of the militia at 24 drills during the year. Thirty-seven per cent of the militia failed to attend this absurdly low minimum requirement in 1914. At the last Federal inspection the instruction of 330 companies or equivalent units was rated as poor and 932 companies were below the standard of efficiency. In 1914 only 34.8 per cent of the National Guard qualified as second-class marksmen or better. In other words, only about one-third of our Organized Militia could shoot well enough to be rated as indifferent marksmen or attain the lowest standard recognized in our military shooting.

Again, the standard of care and the responsibility which the National Guard has shown in respect to the Federal arms, uniforms, and equipment which have been issued to it under the Dick law has been so low that there is now a total shortage of $1,352,761 of such property issued to it, as to which the Federal authorities are unable to get either a report of the property or a proper accountability as to its disposition. Four years ago, in 1912, drastic steps were initiated by the Secretary of War to reduce such shortages. Under the system of divided control it has been found practically impossible to accomplish this. In the case of many States the shortages are so great that if they were charged against the Federal appropriations coming to such States there would be nothing left for rifle practice or camps of instruction or any other training for several years to come. This would mean that to apply the discipline of this method of purchasing efficiency would result in depriving the States of some of the vital elements of training, which they can not afford to lose. In other words, the system proposed by these bills for extending the authority of the Central Government over the militia by Federal payments has been tried and has failed. It has failed in respect to numbers, in respect to marksmanship, in respect to discipline, and in respect to equipment.

It would, of course, be unfair not to remember that there are some militia organizations to whom these criticisms do not apply. Our best militia regiments have attained a degree of soldierly efficiency and patriotic devotion to duty which, in view of the handicaps of system under which they labored, is in the highest degree commendable. It is particularly gratifying that the State of New York in this respect stands at the top. But when a system is proposed for the development of a national force, it should be judged by its results throughout the Nation. It must be judged, not by the exceptions but by the average, and judged by the average this system is a failure.

This failure lies at the root of the system proposed in the two bills. There is no use in enacting, as the bills do, that the militia must keep up to certain standards when there is no way provided of making it keep up to such standards except a way that is a proved failure. It is absurd to provide that hereafter the President may direct the militia to recruit its companies up to maximum war strength when hitherto under the same system he has been unable to keep it up even to a minimum strength. Thus the report for 1915 shows that the Infantry of the militia of the country was 21,571 men below the minimum enlisted strength required by law. If the President has been unable to purchase compliance with this low standard in the past, how can he be expected to purchase compliance with a higher standard in the future?

It is true that the present bills propose to remedy this evil by increasing the Federal payments. But such a remedy does not touch the real evil. It still leaves the Federal Commander in Chief in the position of a benevolent adviser with no power to command. The administration of his plans is in the hands of people over whom he has no control. The Federal Government can advise, can make general regulations, can scold, and threaten to withhold the pay, but the vital function of administration, of giving the orders and seeing that they are obeyed is in the hands of the State governors and their subordinates. Dollars spent without the direct power to see to their application are dollars wasted.

So far as the numbers of the militia are concerned, there is an additional reason why they can not be kept up, a reason which the proposed bills not only do not remove but, on the contrary, perpetuate. The main reason which keeps down enlistments in our National Guard is the liability of the militia to strike duty and the consequent antagonism which has grown up on the part of our laboring men against this form of military service. It is this hostility on the part of the men upon whom the Nation should most rely for its national defense which keeps down the numbers of our State militia. So long as it remains State militia and remains liable to this kind of police duty it will be difficult if not impossible to keep its numbers full. The present bills expressly continue that liability. The House bill contains a provision in section 26 "that nothing contained in this act shall be construed as limiting the rights of the States and Territories to the use of the National Guard within their respective borders in time of peace."

This is the real reason why in Great Britain, where the territorial army is really a national army and not a local police, five young Englishmen enlist where only one young American enlists in our National Guard, and why in Canada six young Canadians enlist in the national guard where one young American enlists in ours. So long as we persist in this faulty system, so long as we try to make the same man do duty as a national soldier and, at the same time, as a State policeman we shall fail, even with the aid of individual pay, to bring our enlistments up.

On the other hand, the introduction of such a system of individual pay unconnected with any field duty will introduce a most serious evil into our body politic. Under the new bills the National Guard officer and soldier will receive individual pay not directly connected with outdoor service or with the specific performance of any military duty. He will be on the annual pay roll of the Federal Treasury, subject only to certain conditions, which may not be rigidly enforced. This will thrust the National Guard into politics. It means the creation of another vested interest in the pork barrel. Some of the provisions of these bills seem almost purposely designed toward the accentuation of such an interest. In the House bill is a provision which forbids any militia organization to be disbanded without the consent of Congress. In other words, no matter how low the standard of discipline may sink in such a regiment or company its commander in chief, the governor, can not discipline it by mustering it out without the consent not of the President or the Secretary of War but of Congress. If the Congressman from that district has a number of loyal supporters in that regiment on the pay roll of the Federal Treasury the consent of Congress will be hard to obtain. No provision could be more skillfully adapted to turn what is ostensibly a system of military pay into a system of congressional patronage.

In 1912 a minority of the same House committee which now recommends this legislation filed a minority report in which, unless I am mistaken, Mr. HAY himself concurred, which uttered this solemn warning on the dangers of such legislation. After stating that it was "a measure that is pregnant with greater possibilities of evil in a financial way, and that gives less assurance of compensating advantages of any kind than any measure that has ever been enacted by Congress with regard to the State militia," the report went on to say:

"The minority making this report is convinced that the legislation proposed by the pending bill is not only unwise but that it is dangerous in the extreme. Rather than enter upon a legislative course that will inevitably entail upon the General Government an enormous expense, which may be found in dire emergency to have been wasted, a course that will surely lead to the creation of a great military force that will become so powerful politically that Congress will be no more able to resist its demands than it has been to resist the demands of the far less compactly organized and manageable army of pension applicants and their friends, this minority would favor a reasonable increase of the Regular Army, leaving the States to maintain their own troops in their own way and at their own expense without any aid whatever from the United States." (Rept. 1117, Pt. II, 62d Cong., 3d sess.)

For the reasons which I have given in this and my preceding letter, I fear that the attempt to build up under the militia provisions of our Constitution a national army as an immediate line of defense behind the Regular Army will meet with failure; that under it in time of peace there can not be developed the numbers or the efficiency necessary for such a purpose, and that in time of war the same dangers will be encountered which made our experiment in 1812 so disastrous.

There has been, however, reported in the Senate bill as section 58 a provision which, if enacted, would open the door toward the creation of a truly national army of citizens. We have already in existence, enacted in 1914, a statute which permits the President in time of war to raise an army of Federal volunteers wholly under the discipline and control of the Federal Government. The operation of this statute is limited to time of war. It has now been abundantly shown by the discussion of the past year that it is too late to wait until the opening of war to raise such a force of volunteers. The requirements of modern war would make such a course disastrous to any nation which tried it. Therefore in section 58 the Senate bill proposes to permit the President to organize and train such a force in time of peace. Under the section there is wisely left to the President a certain amount of discretion in respect to the term of enlistment, the period of training and of service with the colors and with the reserve, which will permit not only experiments to be made to determine which methods will be best suited to our needs but will permit different methods to be used according to the requirements of the different parts of the country and the varying needs of an urban or rural population. If this section becomes law I believe that we could successfully lay the foundation of a really national reserve. We could feel our way so as to do no injustice to existing institutions or faithful and effective militia organizations. And yet we should be upon the right military and constitutional road. Coupled with the provisions, which are also fortunately in both bills, providing for the development and encouragement of our present system of military training camps for students and business men, there would be laid the foundations for gradually building up an intelligent and effective system of citizen soldiery—a force which could absorb such units and men of our present militia as desire that kind of service and leave other units and other men to be developed along the line of home defense. Along that road, I believe, lies the wisest solution of our present problem.

HENRY L. STIMSON.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I will yield some time if the gentleman desires.

Mr. GARDNER. If the gentleman pleases. I have two more speeches.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

[Mr. NORTON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TAGGART].

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, from the foundation of this Government, and for a good while before it was founded, we have had two kinds of armies—a Regular Army and a volunteer or militia army. It is now proposed for the first time to have three kinds of armies. Having all the difficulties of laboring with two kinds of military service, it is proposed now to give us three kinds of military service. It is now proposed to raise 261,000 men as volunteers in the United States Army and to give them the same training as is given the Regular Army, provided the President should so decide. Should the President decide that there should be one year's training to equip such an army, and should this army be put in training for 12 months, it would cost $261,000,000, or more than that. To put it in training for nine months would cost not less than $200,000,000, and the best authorities that we have in the War Department have already decided, and with great reason, that a man to be an efficient soldier ought to have at least nine months of training. If the men of this proposed continental army were trained only half of that time, or four and one-half months, the cost would be more than $100,000,000, while under the bill that is now before the House for organization of the National Guard the average cost would be less than $100 per man, and instead of costing $100,000,000 for four and one-half months' training for 261,000 men, a million men could be trained in the National Guard, who would drill forty-eight times a year and would be given a training of 15 days in actual maneuvers—a million men for the same cost and with more training than is suggested by the amendment for 261,000 men.

I object to questioning the dignity or patriotism of any governor of any State in this Union. I regret to see that there is anyone on the floor of the House who would imagine, if there was danger of invasion or if there was a call for volunteers, that any soldier of the National Guard or any officer of the National Guard or any governor of any State of the Union would not be quite as patriotic as any gentleman on the floor of this House, either from Massachusetts or anywhere else. I actually believe that the same thing would occur as occurred in the Spanish-American War—that more men would offer themselves than could possibly be accepted. And, as far as officers are concerned, we have the spectacle to-day of a boy that served a term as a page on the floor of this House in command of all the forces of the United States that are on the border or in Mexico. It is a cause of anxiety to every intelligent person in the United States that that same young man, who was not educated in West Point, is not immediately in charge of the troops that are about to get into contact with the enemy. They speak about a volunteer officer not learning his business. It is generally recognized that Maj. Gen. Funston knows his business or he would not have charge of all the troops that are on the border of Mexico or inside of Mexico.

And, moreover, this proposed United States militia or continental army looks to me as if it was a suggestion of an unworkable proposition for the express purpose of destroying and getting rid of the National Guard. When you propose the impossible and find out that it can not be worked out, that the American people will not stand for it, then there will be a new and effective argument for a huge Regular Army. [Applause.]

One of the facts connected with armies that is not readily grasped, especially the great European armies, is that the standing army consists only of the young men who are in process of training. The war army is the reserve army. The men who completed their two or three years' service and not those who are immediately under arms make up the armies that are first sent to the field. If we ever have to fight a great European nation on this soil, there is no regular army that the American people will ever tolerate that will be sufficiently large to make even the first line of defense on land. The new rule developed in the great war is for battleships to avoid fortifications and forts and for invading armies to effect a landing without risking the transport service or the navy. This was learned at bitter cost at the Dardanelles. If an invading force can first pass our Navy, then avoid our coast defenses, and they are sufficiently strong to be avoided, the great battles, if any, must be fought by a mobile army either in open ground or in such defenses as the Army may be able to construct at the points that may be threatened. And the more training that that mobile army will have the better.

I submit it to the candid judgment of any intelligent person that a young man who has drilled 48 times a year for three years and who has attended maneuvers every year is a better-trained soldier than one who has served two or three months once a year and has paid no attention to it during the remainder of the year. Moreover, there is no provision in the amendment as to how this volunteer or continental army would be organized into regiments. Men who would be total strangers to each other and strangers to their officers, would be called from different parts of the Union, necessarily in the summer time, when the best men are busiest, and after a few months of tiresome work at 50 cents a day would be sent home.

If one failed to appear he would probably be court-martialed and might be sentenced to a long term of imprisonment. Even the amendment for one year's service in the Regular Army and six years in the reserve, if at the end of one year the recruit suited his officers, would not be any worse than this continental army scheme. While this one year idea for men who acquire a degree of efficiency, in the judgment of their officers, has been adopted here in the Committee of the Whole, I hope it will not prevail in the House, and I will vote against it. And if it does prevail in the House I hope that it will be remedied in the Senate. I believe it would demoralize the Army and cause intense bitterness of feeling. There is nothing so vicious in an Army as anything that even looks like favoritism. Regardless of how efficient the men may be who might serve one year and would then be allowed to leave the Army and go into the reserve, it would be impossible to convince those who were required to remain two years longer that exact justice had been done. I am in favor of an absolutely certain term of enlistment of two years in the line, and four or six years in the reserve. Then every man will be treated alike.

I am astonished that the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], that more than $300,000,000 was paid in bounty in the Civil War, should be made on the floor of the House. This was a mere trifle compared to the cost of the war. This amount would not have paid the expenses of the war for 90 days during the last six months of the great struggle. I regret that this disrespectful allusion should be flung at the good gray heads of the most patriotic body of men that this country has ever produced. It was advanced as an argument in favor of a huge standing army, in which men would be trapped and held and compelled to serve without inducement. It is a slap at the patriotism of those who received the bounty, and it is also the expression of a doubt of the patriotism of the young men of this country who are as eager to enlist as any generation of men in our history.

The national guardsman is the only man under this flag that renders as much service as is required from him for practically nothing. This bill, which will give him one-fourth of the pay of the Regular Army, will do little more than pay the additional expense that he is put to in attending the annual maneuvers and encampments. If some of these very distinguished and patriotic gentlemen would do as we did when I had the honor of serving for several years in the National Guard—go out in the dust when the thermometer is at about ninety or a hundred degrees, in heavy marching order, and take part in the maneuvers, they would be willing to vote, along toward evening, that not even the salary of a Congressman would induce them to continue in any such service. And those boys have rendered this service for nothing. In the Spanish-American War they showed themselves, in most cases, quite as efficient as the Regular Army—the highest-priced Army in the world, an Army that costs the people eleven hundred dollars a year for every officer and man in it.

Under this bill the National Guard will cost only one-tenth as much as the same number of officers and men in the Regular Army. In other words, the cost of the National Guard will be about $100 a year for each officer and man serving in it. They are the soldiers of the people, living among the people, and having the virtues and the patriotism of the people, and they are the very men who will do the fighting if there is any fighting to be done on a large scale.

I am glad to have an opportunity to vote for a more complete training and education for the officers of the National Guard. The quartermaster's department, commissary department, and the medical department should be specially trained and mingled with and coordinated with these departments in the Regular Army. No 30 days at Plattsburg, or any other place, of training of young men for officers will ever satisfy me. Those men who spent 30 days last summer at Plattsburg, learning how to be commanders of troops, and who, I understand, have their names enrolled in the War Department as candidates for commissions in case of war, would refuse to be shaved by a barber who had spent only 30 days learning his trade.

If a man should offer, through the United States mails, to teach a person any kind of profession in 30 days out of which he could make a living, and would induce the person to pay any money for such instruction, he could undoubtedly be sent to the Federal penitentiary for using the mails for fraudulent purposes, and there are those who are serving sentences for precisely that offense. I am glad that we are going to open the opportunities of the Regular Army to officers of the National Guard. Under the new establishment in the Regular Army, if all the officers are graduates of the Military Academy, there will be more than a million dollars' worth of education represented in every regiment. Those men should have a higher duty to perform than parroting orders as first and second lieutenants. Their services are needed to instruct the National Guard. They should learn at once how to maneuver regiments and brigades, and should be entitled to promotion for this class of service. Gen. Grant suggested, in his memoirs, that in time of war the Regular Army should be disbanded and distributed among the volunteer forces. We will probably never do that, but a man who has military capacity should never be stifled by law, but should be allowed to expand to the full measure of his ability. What should be done is to allow the National Guard officer to get the full benefit of the technical and professional instruction of the Regular Army more effectively than we have been doing, and to allow the young officers of the Regular Army, on a greater scale than heretofore, to exercise their talents in handling large bodies of troops. Until this European war came about, we had hopes of universal peace in the world. We can not have it by sitting down and inviting attack, or by supinely refusing to learn how to defend our country. Nothing material has continued to exist without being defended. The United States, with its opportunities, its Government, and the hopes of its people, is the greatest and most precious inheritance that has ever blessed and glorified the fortunes of mankind. The soul is dead in the man who is not willing to fight for this inheritance. More men have died for it in the same length of time than for any other nation in the world. More men have sacrificed their time, their education, their health, and their hopes of the future for this flag in the hundred and forty years that it has fluttered, than for any other standard that has been raised on the globe. The founders raised this flag in 1776, and in the period from 1861 to 1865 its defenders stood at the forge and hammered this Nation together. I submit that we should not leave our country as a prey to designing nations. We are, and should be, as willing to defend it as our fathers were willing.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REILLY].

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARD). The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REILLY] is recognized for five minutes.

[Mr. REILLY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I want in the short time allotted me to refer, first, to the fact that the amendment proposed here by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] is simply in short the continental army plan proposed to this Congress early in the session, to which the public sentiment of the country and the sentiment of Congress failed to give support. In other words, if we should adopt this amendment we should be adopting practically the plan of the continental army, so called.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a moment?

Mr. CRAGO. The gentleman from Massachusetts does not want to interrupt my statement, I am sure.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman does not want his statement to go out in just that form, I hope.

Mr. CRAGO. I want also to correct a statement that was made here yesterday. I do not believe it is the proper policy in framing any military system for this country to denounce the men who are called adjutants general of the States and the men in the higher ranks in the National Guard of the different States of the Union, because I believe that it is to those men that under any law that we may enact we must look to furnish the sentiment back home, which must be relied upon to make possible any military organization; and I know that while we may differ from them in some details—and I do so myself, and I do not think they are unanimous among themselves in some of their recommendations—those men are nevertheless earnestly working to achieve the same good results that we are endeavoring to bring about, and it is to them that we must look largely to make this legislation a success.

I know that in my State of Pennsylvania our adjutant general—that grand old man, Gen. Thomas J. Stewart—is reported to have said, in answer to a statement, that, inasmuch as the Federal Government is going to do so much for the National Guard of our State, the Legislature of Pennsylvania will not have to appropriate so much, "No, gentlemen; it is the duty of the States to contribute in the future as much, if not more, than they have in the past, and we want Pennsylvania to furnish the National Government with a body of troops to which we can point with pride." We are not antagonizing the States, because we must look to the State organizations for the work of building up this Federal Army.

Now, just a word as to the pay feature of this bill. I must say that there was a time a few years ago, when I was in the National Guard, when I was not so much in favor of a policy of payment; but I have seen the growth and the development of the guard, and I appreciate what is involved in the new duties that have been placed upon its members by the National Government, and I feel that it would be impossible to put into effect the reforms that we contemplate here without this pay. It should not be considered as full compensation, but as a partial return for service rendered, a recognition in a small way of the service given by these men to this work. In many cases these men pay out almost the amount proposed to allow them as car fare each time they attend drill. They spend days at the rifle ranges. The officers, many of them, use all their spare hours in making out reports and in looking after the administration of the affairs of their organizations, and the small amount of pay provided is absolutely necessary if we are to demand of officers and men the work and sacrifice necessary in order to meet the new requirements of the service.

In every company armory you will see men gathered who are devoting half a day or an evening each week to this work. Some of them have probably traveled 8 or 10 miles in the country. In the city they pay 20 cents in car fare going and coming. Yet it will be heralded all over this land that this is an attempt to use the people's money injudiciously. I say to you right now that there can be no more judicious expenditure of money under this bill than that which is proposed here. [Applause.]

Mr. HAY. I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to use his time. I have only one speech over here.

Mr. GARDNER. I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the weakness of the Hay bill lies in the fact that it does not make any adequate provision for a reserve enlisted force. We have by amendments made adequate provision so far as reserve officers are concerned, but nowhere in this bill—read it as closely as you will—can you find any adequate provision for a reserve enlisted force.

The purpose of the pending amendment is to supply that deficiency and to bring into the reserve enlisted force adequate numbers to supply the Army as conditions require. We do make provision for the National Guard, but do not for one minute make the mistake in thinking that there is in this bill any compelling sanction, so far as the National Guard is concerned, to obtain enlistments. The mere pittance of $45 a year that is provided in this militia pay bill is not going to result in added military strength so far as the National Guard is concerned.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not at present. There is a natural antipathy broadcast among the artisans of this country against enlisting in the National Guard. You from the country districts may not be aware of it, but we from the city industrial centers recognize that there is a deep-seated antipathy on the part of the artisans of this country against enlisting in the National Guard, because in times of industrial disputes they will be compelled to perform police duty.

If that requirement did not exist, perhaps you might be able to enlarge your National Guard so far as cities and industrial centers are concerned; but I speak advisedly when I say there are tens of thousands of men in these industrial centers willing and anxious to go to the defense of the colors, but who are unwilling to join the National Guard. This provision merely gives an opportunity, under the direction of the Secretary of War, to train these men for perhaps one month or two months a year—perhaps six months all told—when they would be ready for the reserves. Maj. Gen. Wood in his testimony before the committee said that it is only necessary to train a man six months to make an efficient soldier out of him if he has it in him to become a part of a fighting force.

To-day we are confronted with a very acute condition in Mexico. We can not get enlistments. Even under the volunteer bill passed in 1914 we can not avail ourselves of the National Guard until Congress acts. Yet there are many men in the industrial centers of the country who would be willing to enlist in defense of their country as a reserve force if they were but given the opportunity.

This provision is not antagonistic to the National Guard feature. By this bill we take unto ourselves for all time the support and maintenance of the National Guard. By accepting that control over them, as is provided in this bill, you will see that in a decade the entire support of the National Guard will fall upon the National Government. We can not rid ourselves of that obligation after we assume it, no matter how much we would. Personally, I would much rather have supported the citizen soldiery proposition, instead of the Government undertaking by indirect means the control of the National Guard; because, although the world is now aflame with war feeling, I look forward to the time when we will get back again to the normal, and when if we had not nationalized the National Guard its control would still remain in the respective States as it has in times past. Then this reserve force as proposed here could have been adjusted to the restored order when we got back to our equilibrium again. But by this bill we have taken the position of bringing the National Guard entirely under the control of the Government so far as its financial support is concerned.

Under this bill alone we will be obliged to pay $25,000,000 a year for the support of the National Guard. If it results in increasing the National Guard, then the expense will be greater. I question very much whether it will result in increasing the National Guard, because—and I ask every advocate of the National Guard in those States where there is no military feeling, where they appropriate only $10,000 a year for the support of the National Guard, how are you going to compel those States to increase enrollments in the National Guard?

The country to-day is insisting on an adequate reserve force of enlisted men to whom we can turn in case of need. Under the Gard amendment, through increasing the enrollment at the West Point Military Academy, and under other provisions of this bill, we have provided for an increased number of officers and reserve officers but no adequate provision for the reserve enlisted men. The Gardner amendment, adopted the other day, applies largely to the young men who are fresh from college or high school, who want to get a year's training, but there are hundreds of thousands of men employed in industrial centers who decline to go into the National Guard for what they regard as good reasons, declining to assume police duties, and those men will be reached by this volunteer soldier provision. Just because of some little home district sentiment in favor of the maintenance of your National Guard, are you going to vote contrary to the spirit of the country and contrary to the needs of the country to-day, and fail to avail yourselves of every possible means of bringing into the fold of the National Government an increase of strength, so far as enlisted men are concerned? [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, two years ago Congress passed a law providing for a volunteer army, to be called by the President in time of war or threatened war, but requiring first the authorization of Congress. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] now gives that authorization and leaves to the President the authority, if he shall believe now or hereafter, while the law remains in effect, that there is such threatened danger that we ought to have an enlarged Army, to call for volunteers—volunteer enlisted men and volunteer officers. It in no wise injures the standing of the National Guard under the provisions of this bill. To those of us who believe that, with the world aflame and, as the President says, with sparks flying everywhere, there may come a time when we shall need to raise a volunteer army, the proposition is safe and sane. To those of us who sit in quiet complacency, believing that the Lord will protect us from assault from any quarter, there is no occasion to vote for such an amendment. I believe the times are such and the dangers are such that the President of the United States, with the information which he has of our foreign affairs, ought to have the power conferred upon him by this amendment to raise a volunteer army for the purposes which may come before the country. If war comes, we will add to that the men in the National Guard, who are well cared for by the terms of this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, of course the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] will render futile every other provision in this bill providing for the federalization of the National Guard. That amendment is predicated on the same idea which was proposed to this Congress by the late Secretary of War for a continental army. It is a continental army under a different guise. Now, what does it do? It undertakes to apply certain sections of the volunteer law passed for the purpose of having volunteers raised in time of war, and the provisions of that law do not apply in any way to what may be necessary to be done in time of peace.

Under the provisions of this volunteer law, from section 3 to section 12, included in this amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, a great many things are to be done which ought not to be done in time of peace. It provides for the payment of a large number of Regular Army officers in the volunteer forces. It provides for the raising of a great many different kinds of troops which would only be necessary in time of war. It provides, in other words, for the machinery of an army in time of war and not for a reserve which gentlemen seem to have gone crazy about in time of peace.

The gentleman from Wisconsin said there was nothing in the bill providing for a reserve of the National Guard. Why, the gentleman has not read the bill. There are two or three sections in the bill devoted entirely to the reserve of the National Guard, and under that a very large reserve will be created.

This, gentlemen, is a proposition which will undoubtedly destroy the National Guard. Under the provisions proposed in this amendment, if three-quarters of any organization of the National Guard volunteer, they have to be taken into the army provided for under the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CRAGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. CRAGO. Will not the adoption of this amendment wipe out entirely the section providing compensation for the National Guard?

Mr. HAY. Absolutely; and I appeal to the gentlemen who are in favor of building up a true citizen soldiery in this country to vote down this amendment, because under the proposition proposed the President of the United States is given power by which he can call into being an army of 261,000 men and keep them on foot not only for three months, for six months, for one year, for two years, but forever hereafter. [Applause.] Do gentlemen in this Hall want to saddle on the people of the United States practically a regular army of 261,000 men in addition to what they have already provided for in this bill? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] wants to offer an amendment to this section.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 81, lines 12 to 14: In line 12 strike out the words "medical officers," and in line 14 strike out the words "captains or."

Mr. HAY. Personally I have no objection to the amendment, and I do not care to debate it.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate is closed.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a point of order pending on an amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN]. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which is offered would make it impossible for the Federal Government to pay a State after 1920 money for compensation to officers or enlisted men of the National Guard if the State used or permitted by law the use of the National Guard in strike duty. This amendment was offered yesterday, but was not passed upon by the Chair. Early in the day amendments of somewhat similar character were offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING]. Points of order were made against them, and the points of order were sustained by the Chair.

Last evening, when I offered this amendment, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] insisted that my amendment was similar to those offered and ruled upon earlier in the day. I wish to say to the chairman that I am offering this amendment with the idea that it is entirely different from the two heretofore offered, and that it is not subject to the point of order.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] provided that "no member of the National Guard shall be called upon to perform duty in connection with suppression of strikes." Both of his amendments contain those words and are practically to the same effect, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], in making his point of order, based it upon the claim and upon the idea, as he expressed it, that "Congress, by adopting the amendment, would prevent the States from using their troops to quell disturbances and riots, or anything of that sort," a limitation upon the States of their right to use the National Guard.

The amendment of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] contained the words "that no member of the National Guard shall be called upon to perform duty," and so on, and the objection of the gentleman from Virginia and his point of order was based on the idea that this "interfered with the rights of the States to preserve order," and so forth, and that it would limit and restrict the States in their usual and proper use of the National Guard.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] in discussing the point of order for the information of the Chair—and I assume that the Chair was somewhat influenced by the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky and by the argument of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY]—said that "this proposes to take from the States the right reserved to them to use the militia in suppressing internal strife"; that "this amendment proposes to take that right from the States." And the Chair said in that connection that "if the Chair did think it would interfere with the State authorities in calling upon the National Guard" the Chair would hold it out of order as not being germane. The further statement of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] was that "if this amendment was adopted, no governor of a State could call out the National Guard to suppress a riot or anything else." My idea and my contention is that the amendment I offer in no way limits the right of a State in the use of its National Guard. Any State can use its National Guard in any way it pleases, to be called out for strike duty, to suppress an insurrection, to prevent or suppress riots. The State is absolutely unlimited, as far as my amendment is concerned, or would be if it were adopted and became a part of the law—absolutely unlimited in any right it may wish to exercise respecting the use of its National Guard. This is a limitation upon the Federal Government in its use of money. This amendment says that no Federal money "shall be used for the purpose of compensating any organization of the National Guard or any officer or enlisted man thereof in any State or Territory which shall, by law or otherwise, provide for or permit the use of its National Guard or any part thereof in connection with any strike," and so forth. If my amendment be adopted, a State can use its National Guard as it pleases, but if it chooses to use it contrary to this provision it simply makes it impossible for it to receive the money, or impossible for the Federal Government to pay the money which would otherwise be payable under this act.

I might speak of a statement made by the Chair yesterday in sustaining the point of order. He said there had been no judicial determination of the meaning of the word "strike"; that no court had determined what a strike is. Mr. Chairman, everyone knows what a strike is, and every court knows, and the Chair knows. What everyone knows a judicial body can properly and must take judicial notice of. No one has any doubt as to what a strike is or as to what the meaning of this amendment if adopted and a part of the law would be. So it seems to me, if the Chair will permit, that even if it were true that no court has said what a strike is, there would be no force in what the Chair says, that if there has been no judicial determination of what a strike is, therefore an amendment of this kind which speaks simply of a strike is out of order and that the point of order against it ought to be sustained.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. The word "strike" has been judicially defined in at least four cases in the Federal court and in one case in the Court of Appeals of the State of New York, as also the term "general strike" and the term "sympathetic strike." The term "strike" has been legally differentiated from the word "boycott." Any lawyer can get those decisions in any legal dictionary. I took occasion last night to look it up myself and found those seven or eight cases in five minutes. So the Chair was unintentionally in error in stating that the term had not been defined. It has been defined over and over again, both in connection with criminal matters and in connection with strike clauses in contracts.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should not speak of the merits of the amendment I have offered until the point of order is disposed of, but I wish to say that my purpose in offering the amendment is to improve this bill and to assist the National Guard; I am not posing as the spokesman for organized labor, as is intimated by some of those who oppose the amendment.

The National Guard ought not to be used in strike duty, and while it is so used there will be difficulty in securing enlistments; a sufficient number of young men to fill the ranks, especially the right kind of men, can not be had. Young men employed in stores, shops, and factories will not enlist if they are liable to be called out against their own friends and fellow workmen. They are patriotic, intelligent, and strong, able and willing to submit to training for duty as soldiers, and willing to answer the call of their country in time of need, but they refuse to perform the work of common policemen, especially as the work they will very likely be asked to do will be against their friends and neighbors.

If an organized force is needed for the purpose of quelling a riot or disbursing a mob, there should be a State constabulary, under State authority. The State of Pennsylvania has a constabulary, composed of 300 men, organized and maintained by the State, and its work has been so satisfactory that it has not been necessary to call upon the National Guard or any other military force.

In the State of New York the organizing of a constabulary is discussed, and the six States of New England are, I am informed, thinking of acting together for the purpose of effecting a constabulary for use by all or by any of the States if its services be needed. The idea moving these States in effecting these organizations is that the National Guard ought not to be required to do strike duty or ordinary police duty. If the National Guard were relieved of this disagreeable duty its organization would be dignified and it would be just what its name implies, a national force, for the defense of the country.

The only possible objection to a State constabulary, or the only one I have heard, is that the entire expense of maintaining it must be borne by the State alone, whereas a part of the expense of the National Guard is borne by the Federal Government.

I do not believe the States will refuse to maintain constabulary forces, even if there is some expense connected with it.

The people of the States are patriotic; they are willing to do the best thing; they are willing to do whatever is proper and necessary in assisting the Federal Government to provide for proper defense of the country; they will not insist upon an improper use of the National Guard if its strength and efficiency as a force for national defense be thereby seriously impaired. They will do the right thing, even if it does cost a little more money.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. The mind of the Chair did not rest easy in the conclusions that were hastily reached and somewhat crudely stated in sustaining the point of order made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] and the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING], nor were the reasons which controlled the mind of the Chair stated with any degree of elaborateness. In fact, in ruling upon the point of order made to the first amendment the Chair did not state the controlling reason, and in ruling upon the point of order made to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] the thought was hinted at rather than stated. With the permission of the committee, the Chair will undertake to state somewhat more elaborately the reasons that operated upon his mind.

One of the purposes of the bill under consideration is to extend the authority of the Federal Government over the National Guard, but it is no part of the bill that the State authorities will be interfered with in the control of the National Guard within their respective boundaries, except as fixed by the limitations of this bill. No section of the bill undertakes to do that. There is a section which expressly declares that shall not be done. The Chair is of opinion that an amendment which would limit the power of the Federal authority to call upon the National Guard for purposes as defined in the amendments offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] would be in order, but when the line of demarcation is clearly drawn, as it is in this bill, the Chair is of the opinion that an amendment which undertakes to define what the State authorities may do with reference to the National Guard within the boundaries of the State is not in order, and it was upon that thought and theory that the Chair sustained the points of order made by the gentleman from Virginia to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado yesterday.

The Chair, however, was not clear in his mind about that, and for the reason that he was not clear he invited a submission of the matter to the Committee of the Whole in the usual way, and virtually by his language suggested to the gentleman from Colorado an appeal from the decision of the Chair. The gentleman from Colorado did appeal from the decision of the Chair, and the committee voted that the decision of the Chair should stand as the judgment of the committee. When the committee has spoken upon a matter of parliamentary procedure the Chair thinks that is higher authority than any decision of the Chair, or when the House has spoken that that is higher than any decision of the Speaker, because the Committee of the Whole and the House are the lawmaking bodies. If the Chair is right about that let us apply it to the amendment which is pending, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN]. This amendment is designed to accomplish the same purpose as the amendments offered yesterday were designed to accomplish. There is no difference in them in principle. It is true that it is drawn in the form of a limitation on an appropriation, but this is not an appropriation bill; this is a legislative bill. The Chair sees no difference whatever, and the Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment in the form of a new section, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KEATING as a new section:

"SEC. 75a. That, subject to the limitations of section 26, no member of the National Guard shall be called upon to perform duty in connection with controversies between employers and employees where the question at issue is one of hours of labor, wages, working conditions, and the right of either side to the controversy to organize for the safeguarding of its legal interests."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, on that I make the point of order upon the same ground.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, the section referred to in the amendment is the section which recognizes the right of the State to use the militia in such fashion as it may see fit for State purposes, and, therefore, the amendment meets the objection made by the chairman of the committee. The chairman based his decision, sustaining the point of order, on the proposition that the amendment I offered yesterday and the amendment offered this morning by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] undertook to deprive the States of power to use the militia for State purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, no; if the gentleman will permit, it was not that at all. It was upon the proposition that the amendment offered was not germane. The whole question involved here is a question of germaneness.

Mr. KEATING. But why is it not germane?

The CHAIRMAN. Because no part of the bill undertakes in any way to control the authority of the States over the National Guard in their respective boundaries.

Mr. KEATING. Just so, and this amendment does not undertake to interfere with the use of the National Guard by the State authorities. It expressly disclaims any such intention. If the Chair will refer to the section of the bill mentioned in the amendment, he will see the point I make.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. In a moment. Is it the thought and intention of this amendment to provide that the Federal authorities can not call out the militia in case of controversy?

Mr. KEATING. Exactly. Under the decision rendered by the Chair yesterday, we can not make the amendment any broader. If the Chair will recall, he asked me yesterday whether, in my judgment, the amendment I submitted could be so construed as to limit the powers of the governor to call out the militia. I gave a rather evasive reply, because, Mr. Chairman, it was my hope that the amendment I submitted would restrict the authority of the governor. The Chair sustained the point of order and ruled out my amendment, but this amendment is so drawn as not to interfere with the rights of the States, and I submit, under the decision of the Chair just rendered, it is clearly in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Virginia on this point of order.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] is addressing the Chair.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make this further suggestion as to the point of order against this amendment: The Constitution of the United States makes the President of the United States the Commander in Chief of the Militia of the United States when called into the service of the country. That is the constitutional power that is given to the President of the United States. In addition to this, the Constitution gives to the President absolute power to call out the militia for the purpose of suppressing insurrections or to execute the laws of the Union, so that it seems to me to be a simple proposition that this power which is given to the President of the United States, coming from the Constitution itself, that Congress can not put any limitation upon that authority.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman permit the Chair?

Mr. DENT. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair agrees with the gentleman on that proposition, but this amendment says, "subject to the limitation of section 26."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, this has nothing to do with the constitutional authority that the President has.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course. The Chair can not pass upon the constitutional phase of it, that is well understood, but that would go to the point of the merits and not to the point of order——

Mr. DENT. Does the Chair hold that he has no authority to pass upon the point of order on the constitutional authority?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so holds——

Mr. DENT. Of course, if the Chair holds that——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so holds in accordance with the precedents. If the Chair should hold that he could take into consideration that question, why, of course, the gentleman from Alabama will recognize that it would become a mere arbitrary construction of the Constitution by the Chair and would limit the power of the House. The precedents are well fixed that the Chair can not pass upon a constitutional question. The Chair is of opinion that this amendment is in order.

Mr. KEATING. May I say just a word in support of the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, the title of the bill which we are now discussing is "to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States," and, as I said yesterday while we were discussing the point of order, I believe this amendment, more than any other amendment suggested to this bill, will tend to increase the efficiency of the National Guard, because it will make available for enlistment in the National Guard hundreds of thousands of the young men of this country who to-day do not feel that they can afford to join the National Guard.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KEATING. I do.

Mr. TILSON. Does the gentleman think that his amendment will do that at all? Does it not leave the men subject to the same uses by the State for strike duty that they were before? The gentleman's amendment does not reach that at all, except so far as the use of the National Guard by the President is concerned. Is not that it?

Mr. KEATING. So far as their use for Federal purposes is concerned, and that is as far as we may go under the ruling of the Chair. In that connection I want to submit the opinion of a great Republican leader, the Hon. Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of War in President Taft's Cabinet. In an article in the New York Times of recent date, Mr. Stimson said:

So far as the numbers of the militia are concerned, there is an additional reason why they can not be kept up; a reason which the proposed bills not only do not remove but, on the contrary, perpetuate. The main reason which keeps down enlistments in our National Guard is the liability of the militia to strike duty and the consequent antagonism which has grown up on the part of our laboring men against this form of military service. It is this hostility on the part of the men upon whom the Nation should most rely for its national defense which keeps down the numbers of our State militia. So long as it remains State militia and remains liable to this kind of police duty it will be difficult, if not impossible, to keep its numbers full. The present bills expressly continue that liability. The House bill contains a provision in section 26, "that nothing contained in this act shall be construed as limiting the rights of the States and Territories to the use of the National Guard within their respective borders in time of peace."

This is the real reason why in Great Britain, where the territorial army is really a national army and not a local police, five young Englishmen enlist where only one young American enlists in our National Guard, and why in Canada six young Canadians enlist in the national guard where one young American enlists in ours. So long as we persist in this faulty system, so long as we try to make the same man do duty as a national soldier and at the same time as a State policeman, we shall fail, even with the aid of individual pay, to bring our enlistments up.

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I will.

Mr. HAY. Does not this amendment of the gentleman do the same thing?

Mr. KEATING. I have no desire to evade that question. Yesterday I endeavored to offer an amendment which, given a broad construction, would have rendered it impossible for either the State or Federal authorities to use the militia in industrial difficulties. That amendment was ruled out of order. I am now offering an amendment which goes as far as we can go under the ruling of the Chair.

I trust the committee will vote in this amendment in order that we may have an expression of opinion from this House, and I trust that at the other end of the Capitol or in conference some method may be found by which the militia of this country will be relieved from strike duty.

My reason for that is that I want to see the National Guard built up into a great effective arm of defense for this Nation. My friends, the National Guard will never be as effective as we all desire to have it so long as the members of organized labor, the mechanics and artisans of this country, feel that they can not with safety join the National Guard; so long as they feel that to-morrow, maybe, they will be called out to shoot down the fellow members of their labor organizations.

I want to point out, too, that it is not necessary that the militia should be used in that fashion. No sane man, no patriotic man, wants to see disorder go unchecked in this country; but there are other powers to enforce the laws during industrial difficulties, and it is not necessary to compel members of the National Guard to perform police duty. The sheriff of the county can call to his assistance every able-bodied man in the county, and I have never seen an industrial difficulty—and I have had considerable experience with them—where an honest, courageous, efficient sheriff who would go to the full extent of his constitutional power and who would play fair as between both sides to the controversy could not have enforced the law. I hope the House will adopt this amendment.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. Anyone who wishes to rise in opposition to the amendment will be recognized.

Mr. HAY. I ask for a vote. I am opposed to the amendment, but I do not want to discuss it all day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] can move to close debate.

Mr. HAY. If the Chair will put the question, debate will be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] is demanding recognition.

Mr. HAY. Then I move to close debate on this amendment.

Mr. DECKER. I do not see why the members of the committee should not be permitted to debate the amendment. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. HAY. But I move to close debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] moves that debate on this amendment be closed.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. DECKER. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 115, noes 29.

So the motion to close debate on the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. HAMLIN. May we not have that amendment reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. KEATING. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 28, noes 154.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 81, line 15, after the word "companies," insert "regimental adjutants."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 76. That when Congress shall have authorized the use of the armed land forces of the United States in the emergency of actual or imminent war requiring the use of troops in excess of those of the Regular Army, the President may, under such regulations as he shall prescribe, draft into the military service of the United States, to serve therein for the period of the war unless sooner discharged, any or all members of the National Guard. All persons so drafted shall, from the date of their draft, stand discharged from the militia and shall from said date be subject to such laws and regulations for the government of the Army of the United States as are applicable to members of the Volunteer Army, and shall be embodied in organizations corresponding as far as practicable to those of the Regular Army or shall be otherwise assigned as the President may direct. The commissioned officers of said organizations shall be appointed from among the members thereof, officers with rank not above that of colonel to be appointed by the President alone, and all other officers to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Officers and enlisted men in the service of the United States under the terms of this section shall have the same pay and allowances as officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army of the same grades and the same prior service.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word and asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, the precedents of history are as illuminating as the precedents of law. Human nature remains constant, although the habits of men may change. What has come to pass upon one occasion may be expected when similar conditions exist to become manifest again. "History repeats itself." "There is nothing new under the sun."

I desire to detail briefly an almost forgotten page of the history of the United States and of my own State of Massachusetts. I may say frankly at the outset that I do not hark back to the past because the particular incident with which I shall deal commends itself to the pride of the native sons of Massachusetts. My purpose is to seek to show by the sequence of events in our earlier history the dangers which may be lurking in the preparedness legislation which is now before the Congress and the country.

I shall ask you to turn your minds back to the summer of 1812. It had for some time been obvious that war, either with Great Britain or with France or both, was inevitable. I need not in this connection trace the causes of the war. It is sufficient to say that while in some sections of the country the prospect was accepted with equanimity, in others the idea of a struggle with any European power was regarded with abhorrence. New England generally, and especially Massachusetts, were perhaps the most outspokenly hostile to a conflict of any kind.

After extended debates in Congress the House of Representatives passed a declaration of war by a vote of 79 to 49. Massachusetts had in the Twelfth Congress, which was then sitting, a delegation numbering 17. It is interesting to notice that to-day, with the House two and one-half times as large as the House of 1812, the Massachusetts delegation numbers 16. Fifteen out of the seventeen voted on the declaration of war; six were in favor of war and nine were opposed. One of the two not voting had been so recently elected to Congress that he had not had time to journey to Washington, but later announced that he would have voted against war if he had been able so to do.

President Madison signed the declaration of war on June 18, 1812. Swift messengers carried the news to all parts of the country, but rapidly as they could speed it was four days later—on June 22—when the news was received in Boston. Public opinion against the war, which had been running high, surged to its climax. Considerations of trade with which the war might interfere; of friendship for Great Britain or hostility to France; of partisan politics; of innate aversion to armed conflict—all these things contributed to fan the flames of opposition.

Caleb Strong was governor of Massachusetts in 1812. He was no ordinary man. He had been governor from 1800 until 1807; he was governor also from 1812 to 1816. His occupancy of the governor's chair is considerably longer, I believe, than that of any governor in the history of our State. Strong was a man of sterling character and exceedingly popular. He was generally known by the cognomen "The Just." He was bitterly opposed to the war, and by virtue of his official position as well as of his high character and personal charm he was able to carry with him much public sentiment.

Gen. Dearborn, formerly Secretary of War, had for some weeks been assigned by the Secretary of War to the superintendency of military preparations in New England. He had been especially charged with the duty of enlisting as many men as possible for the Regular Army. Owing to the public's frame of mind, however, his success along this line had been almost negligible. Various devices were employed to make the course of enlistment difficult. When news of the war reached Boston Dearborn thought the opportune moment to counterbalance the weeks of vexation and impotence had at length arrived. The Massachusetts quota, under an act of Congress calling for the raising of 100,000 men, was 10,000 men. On June 22, the very day when the news came to Boston, Dearborn made requisition upon the governor for a quota comprising 41 companies of artillery and infantry. Gov. Strong did absolutely nothing in response to this requisition. Perhaps this is not strictly accurate—he issued that afternoon a proclamation for a fast day; reading between the lines of the proclamation it was readily construed to be a protest against the war and the authorities who were responsible for the war, rather than, as stated in the preamble, a summons to "fasting, humiliation, and prayer." In the course of the proclamation Gov. Strong referred to the war as being "against the nation from which we are descended and which for many generations has been the bulwark of the religion we profess," and referred to the fact that "by this awful and alarming change in our circumstances the people of this Commonwealth are in a peculiar manner exposed to personal suffering and the loss of a great proportion of their substance." On June 26 and July 15 Gen. Dearborn renewed his call for troops, but again Gov. Strong failed to take any action whatever. July 21 the Secretary of War himself urged the governor to order out the militia in accordance with the request of Gen. Dearborn, but the governor remained obdurate.

On what ground was based this contumacy? It has sometimes been said that Gov. Strong was acting as a party man, and because he believed the sentiment of his State to be resolved against the war. To what extent these elements entered into his decision, it is, of course, impossible to be certain. In any event he had more creditable and substantial grounds with which to buttress his position, though it may perhaps be said that they were arguments "after the fact." The constitution of Massachusetts provides that—

The governor and council shall have authority to require the opinions of the justices of the supreme judicial court upon important questions of law and upon solemn occasions.

Pursuant to this clause in the constitution, Gov. Strong, on August 1, 1813—six weeks after the original requisition upon him for troops—asked the opinion of our supreme court upon questions framed substantially as follows: As the militia of the several States may be employed in the service of the United States for the three special purposes of executing the laws of the Union, of suppressing insurrections, and of repelling invasions, have the commanders in chief of the militia of the several States a right to determine whether any aforesaid exigency exists, so as to require them to place the militia, or any part of it, in the service of the United States, at the request of the President, to be commanded by him pursuant to acts of Congress? After the militia troops have been ordered into the service of the United States, has the President the right to assign officers of the Army to command them?

To the first question the Supreme Court answered "Yes" and to the second "No." The Massachusetts Supreme Court at that period was an unusually strong one. Three men, who were successively chief justice of the court—Theophilus Parsons. Samuel Sewall, Isaac Parker—were then upon the bench and joined in the opinion. When men of such judicial eminence unanimously decided that the governor was within his rights in declining to allow the President of the United States to judge for Massachusetts whether a constitutional exigency existed, it can not be said that Gov. Strong did not have some foundation for his course. If I can get time, I shall read the opinion later in my remarks. It is exceedingly interesting and suggestive in its reasoning.

Connecticut, Rhode Island, and New Hampshire shared the popular view of Massachusetts as to the war; the governor of each State followed the lead of Gov. Strong in refusing to put at the disposal of the President the militia troops of his State. Later in the war—September, 1814—the governor of Vermont took a similar position in the very face of the enemy. In his annual message to Congress President Madison commented upon the serious consequences of the course of the New England States, saying:

> The refusal was founded on a novel and unfortunate exposition of the provisions of the Constitution relating to the militia. It is obvious that if the authority of the United States to call into service and command the militia for the public defense can be thus frustrated even in a state of declared war, and, of course, under apprehensions of invasion preceding war, they are not one nation for the purpose most of all requiring it.

A case which throws some light upon the respective authority of a governor and the President over the militia was decided by the United States Supreme Court in 1827. (Martin v. Mott, 12 Wheat., 19.) Mr. Justice Story, pronouncing the unanimous decision of the court, said:

> We are all of opinion that the authority to decide whether the exigency has arisen belongs exclusively to the President, and that his decision is conclusive upon all other persons.

It should be noted, however, that the case in question involved a conflict between a deputy marshal of the United States and a militia soldier, and it especially appeared that the militiaman had refused to rendezvous and enter into the service of the United States, in direct disobedience of the orders of the governor of New York. Under these circumstances the sentence above quoted from Mr. Justice Story's opinion, which seems to be broad enough to include governors as well as all other persons, was in no way necessary to the decision of the court. The actual holding, purged of obiter dicta, seems not, therefore, to bear upon the question now before us. In the Massachusetts case governor and President were in direct antagonism; in the New York case in complete accord.

It is difficult to visualize in this day the inflamed state of public opinion in Massachusetts during the months of July and August, 1812. The House of Representatives of the Massachusetts Legislature issued a violent address to the people of Massachusetts on June 26, couched in the most intemperate language possible. The address is much too long to quote even in part; it characterizes the war as "a wanton sacrifice of your best interests" and attacks France as vigorously as it defends England. Two sentences are perhaps especially striking:

> Organize a peace party throughout your country and let all other party distinctions vanish. Let there be no volunteers except for defensive war.

A somewhat similar pronunciamento was issued by the Members of the Federal House of Representatives who had voted against war, including several Massachusetts Members. The newspapers of the time recite the indignities to which the Members who had voted for the war were subjected. Congressman Turner, Member for the Plymouth district, and chief justice of the court of sessions for that county, was seized by a crowd on the evening of August 3 in the main street of Plymouth, and, in his own words, received "blows to the number of 15 or 20 with such force as to create lameness and soreness which lasted a week." Two other Massachusetts war Members, Seaver and Widgery, were publicly insulted and hissed in the Boston Exchange. Clergymen denounced in their sermons the war and those voting for the war. Special town meetings were held for the purpose of adopting memorials in opposition to the war. The newspaper columns of the day teemed with opposition to the contest. Both in Massachusetts and New Hampshire feeling ran so high that talk of disunion—of separating New England or a part of it from the Union—was freely indulged in.

So much for history. What is the application of that history to the present day?

We have seen the picture of one of the 13 States, the scene of the Battles of Lexington, Concord, and Bunker Hill, 'obstinately and actively opposing the President of the United States even after war was declared. We have seen that this opposition was participated in by a distinguished governor of the State, by the house of representatives of the State, by town meetings, and other gatherings of citizens. We have seen that feeling ran so high that Members of Congress, who had voted doubtless as their consciences dictated, were subjected to insult and even assault on their return home. We have seen that Massachusetts was by no means alone in this attitude; that the other New England States stood shoulder to shoulder with her in embarrassing in the most direct and vital way open to them the preparations of the Federal Government for war. All this, remember, occurred at a day when men of 45 could recall when the Declaration of Independence was signed; could remember Saratoga and Trenton; could remember the climax at Yorktown. Boys not yet old enough to vote had seen Washington pass by. Yet Massachusetts—the cradle of liberty—went almost to extremity in opposition to an existing war of the United States against a foreign foe. Massachusetts and the United States then comprised an almost homogeneous people. No one who has read history can doubt the inherent patriotism of New England. Yet the recital of the events of those days is perhaps not an especially agreeable one to those who love Massachusetts.

What happened once may happen again. A declaration of war may again, as a century ago, be able to command a substantial majority in Congress and yet be abhorrent to a considerable section of the United States.

Is there danger that the conduct of a governor or governors acting, if you please, in the sincere conviction that it is their duty so to act may, nevertheless, embarrass cruelly the national preparations for war? More specifically, could a governor of Massachusetts or of Illinois or of California to-day act in such a way as to prevent the militia of his State being taken into the national forces upon the outbreak of war? The question has never been answered conclusively. It is true that the case of Martin against Mott, cited above, states that the decision of the President that an exigency exists is determinative and controlling upon the governors of the several States. But suppose the governor of a given State asserts that under the existing state of facts the case of Martin against Mott does not apply, or is not binding upon him, or is not law to-day, and that therefore he will not turn over the militia troops to the President. What then? We might and probably should have a theoretical remedy against such governor or governors, but of what practical value would it be when we are threatened with invasion by a foreign foe, with neither time nor inclination to be wrangling with a fractional portion of our own body politic? We certainly do not want to enforce obedience of a refractory governor by means of arms; when we are in a state of war we certainly do not wish to meander through the law courts to establish that we as a Nation were correct in our contention.

Suppose the entire State militia is engaged in suppressing riots within the State when war comes. Such service has frequently, as we all know, been required of the militia. Is the duty imposed by the governor to preserve order during the riot to be subordinated to the call of the President, or vice versa? This question has never been decided.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] asks that the gentleman from Massachusetts may proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. HAY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, how much time does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire? The gentleman is not speaking to this section particularly.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I think I am speaking to the general question involved in these sections that we are now debating.

Mr. HAY. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 25 minutes, 5 minutes to go the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN], 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS], and 5 to myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 25 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I have no objection at this time; I am interested in the gentleman's remarks. But it does seem to me inconsistent that the House should refuse by a majority to give to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] an opportunity to talk five minutes on a matter that very much concerns organized labor in this country, and that now we can secure unanimous consent for 25 or 30 minutes for another matter in the bill. I had a thought as to whether or not militarism, that has been percolating through the Halls of Congress to a large extent, may have something to do with it, and that there is some partiality in regard to these matters.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] will proceed for five minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to put into the RECORD the opinion of the justices of Massachusetts to which I have referred, so far as it bears on this question, and also certain extracts from the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Martin against Mott.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. Following is the citation referred to:

[Extract from opinion of the justices of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 8 Mass., 548.]

On the construction of the Federal and State Constitutions must depend the answers to the several questions proposed. As the militia of the several States may be employed in the service of the United States for the three specific purposes of executing the laws of the Union, of suppressing insurrections, and repelling invasions, the opinion of the judges is requested whether the commanders in chief of the militia of the several States have a right to determine whether any of the exigencies aforesaid exist, so as to require them to place the militia, or any part of it, in the service of the United States, at the request of the President, to be commanded by him pursuant to acts of Congress.

The Federal Constitution provides that when either of these exigencies exist the militia may be employed, pursuant to some act of Congress, in the service of the United States; but no power is given, either to the President or to the Congress, to determine that either of the said exigencies does in fact exist. As this power is not delegated to the United States by the Federal Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States, it is reserved to the States respectively; and from the nature of the power it must be exercised by those with whom the States have respectively intrusted the chief command of the militia.

It is the duty of these commanders to execute this important trust agreeably to the laws of their several States respectively, without reference to the laws or officers of the United States in all cases, except those specially provided for in the Federal Constitution. They must therefore determine when either of the special cases exist, obliging them to relinquish the execution of this trust and to render themselves and the militia subject to the command of the President.

A different construction, giving to Congress the right to determine when those special cases exist, authorizing them to call forth the whole of the militia, and taking them from the commanders in chief of the several States, and subjecting them to the command of the President, would place all the militia in effect at the will of the Congress and produce a military consolidation of the States, without any constitutional remedy, against the intentions of the people, when ratifying the Federal Constitution. Indeed, since the passing of the act of Congress of February 28, 1795, vesting in the President the power of calling forth the militia, when the exigencies mentioned in the Constitution shall exist, if the President has the power of determining when those exigencies exist, the militia of the several States is in fact at his command and subject to his control.

No inconveniences can reasonably be presumed to result from the construction, which vests in the commanders in chief of the militia in the several States the right of determining when the exigencies exist obliging them to place the militia in the service of the United States. These exigencies are of such a nature that the existence of them can be easily ascertained by or made known to the commanders in chief of the militia, and when ascertained the public interest will induce a prompt obedience to the acts of Congress.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. Is that Massachusetts decision a majority decision? Was it a majority opinion or an equally divided court?

Mr. ROGERS. At that time there were five justices on the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. Two of them were engaged in other work in remote parts of the State and were unable to participate in the decision. But the other three justices, constituting a majority of the court, rendered a unanimous opinion. Each of the three was successively chief justice of the State, and the opinion probably represented the general opinion of the bar and of the bench at that time.

Mr. RICKETTS. Will the gentleman pardon me for another question?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. Was the opinion reported officially?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes. You will find it in the Eighth Massachusetts.

Now, Mr. Chairman, suppose a governor foresees a war which, in his judgment, will work hardship upon his State or which, for some other reason, he bitterly opposes. He disbands the militia before the war has broken out. What can the Federal Government do?

It is true that the pending Hay bill, by section 31, provides—that no organization of the National Guard which is entitled to and shall have received compensation under the provisions of this act shall be disbanded without the consent of Congress.

What does this provision amount to? If constitutional, of course it would in theory eliminate the disbandment problem. But is it constitutional? I venture to say that no Member of this House will assert positively that it is. Why? Because the control over the militia of a State is, in time of peace, vested in the governor. A State may perhaps—though this, too, is disputed—barter away in exchange for Federal aid part of its inherent domination over the militia. But if a governor prefers to cast away Federal aid, can there be any doubt that he has the right, in spite of the National Government, to do with the militia as he wishes, even to the point of disbanding it?

But let us admit that the above section is binding upon the governor and that he has no constitutional right to order a disbandment.

What if, under the order of the governor, the militia is nevertheless disbanded? What then? Shall the United States send an invading force into the recalcitrant State and insist that the disbanding be undone? The mere statement of the problem carries with it some slight idea of the impracticability of a remedy in case a State is determined to resist and disobey the Federal requirements.

In view of the importance of this aspect of the case, let me repeat. Suppose a State or group of States disobey and disband the militia, just as Gov. Blease disbanded the South Carolina militia during the present administration, what shall be the course of the United States? What would be its course if a group of States—New England, the South Atlantic States, New York and Pennsylvania, or the Pacific States—should act in concert in the way suggested? The remainder of the country might be unanimously and urgently for the war. Yet the section which was disaffected could seriously cripple the efficiency and success of the rest of the Nation.

Of course I do not pretend that this is likely to happen. I simply assert that it has happened; that human nature has not changed very much in a century and that it may, if our laws continue to permit, happen again.

The Hay type of bill retains the militia, in all its fundamentals, as it has existed since our Government began. No one knows or can know the precise limit and demarcation of State and Federal authority. It is a vast and almost wholly unexplored twilight zone. Precisely here is the difficulty which the administration sought to remedy when it proposed, through Secretary Garrison, a completely federalized force. It was this same difficulty which led the special Massachusetts Commission on Military Education and Reserve to say unanimously in its report, dated December 10 last:

For these reasons the commission wishes to state clearly that its recommendation goes to the point of making the militia actually a Federal force and nothing less. It should be controlled and paid by the Federal Government and subject to the orders of the Federal Government.

Does the Hay bill accomplish this result? Does it prevent an obdurate governor from tying the hands of the President and Congress? Is it conceivable that another Gov. Strong, of Massachusetts, should be able virtually to keep his State out of a war in which the United States was engaged? I have not been able to convince myself that, even though the Hay bill should be passed, this danger would not exist almost in equal measure with 1812. Herein, to my mind, is the fundamental and menacing weakness of the present program.

Of what practical value to the country is it that we have a theoretical remedy against the State, against the governor of a State, or against the militia of a State? Suppose war has broken out. Suppose a single State, or certain officers of the militia, or the governor of a single State shall prove recalcitrant. How, Mr. Chairman, can we in practice achieve any result from that situation which will help the United States? Let us assume that we may have a perfectly beautiful theoretical remedy under the Constitution. What practical remedy have we? None whatever short of war against the State.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROGERS. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman is making a very interesting argument, which I do not wish to interrupt; but was not that question practically dealt with in the war between the States?

Mr. ROGERS. How did we deal practically with that question when we were confronted with the situation in South Carolina during the present administration?

Mr. MONTAGUE. During the present administration?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is in a time of peace.

Mr. ROGERS. When the militia of South Carolina were disbanded by order of the governor? The Civil War settled the question of secession, but not of disobedience, on the part of a State. We can not be sure that conditions will not arise which will make a war exceedingly unpopular in a given section. How, under the law in effect to-day or under the law proposed in this bill, shall we cope with the situation which may grow out of that unpopularity? [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for five minutes of this time primarily that I might propound a question to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY]. We heard it stated on the floor yesterday that the word "draft" is obnoxious to the National Guard. I do not like the word myself. It seems to me that it is wholly unnecessary to whip a willing horse, and there is something a little obnoxious about the word "draft," because a draft has been resorted to historically only when patriotism was not sufficient to cause adequate enlistments. My inquiry is, if the word "order" could not be substituted for the word "draft" without impairing its legal effect?

Mr. HAY. The word "order" has not the same legal significance as the word "draft." Therefore the section would not, in the opinion of the lawyers who have looked into it, be constitutional if the word "order" were used. The word "draft" has a distinct meaning in all military bills and laws, and the word "order" does not mean the same thing. The word "order" presupposes that the force being ordered is already in the service of the United States; but as a matter of fact you can not, under the Constitution of the United States, order the militia into the service of the United States for the purpose of going beyond the boundaries of the United States. Therefore you have to draft them and divorce them from their status as militia in order that you may use them as Federal troops.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The word "draft" is not used anywhere in the Constitution, is it?

Mr. HAY. Not in the Constitution; no.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Then there is no language in the Constitution which provides that the Congress in a bill giving the President authority must use the word "draft."

Mr. HAY. Well, but we must use the English language in such a way as to empower the President.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is precisely it. Now, we do not create any authority in the President, whether we use the word "draft" or whether we use the word "order." If the President has the power to draft, has he not the power to order, and would not the two words mean the same thing?

Mr. HAY. They do not mean the same thing. The word "order" and the word "draft" are two entirely separate and distinct words, and mean entirely separate and distinct things. And if the gentleman will look into the debates during the war, when the draft sections were considered by Congress, as I have done, he will find that the same question arose, and that after a full debate on it it was concluded that the word "draft" was necessary in order to give the President the powers desired. But the main proposition to which I wish to call the attention of the gentleman is that we want to divorce the National Guard from its character as a militia organization in time of war.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I agree with the gentleman precisely.

Mr. HAY. And in order to do that they must cease to be militia when they come into the service of the United States in time of war.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Could we not substitute the words "call into the service of the United States"?

Mr. HAY. There would be the same trouble with that language.

Mr. CANNON. Why the same trouble? Why not amend it so that it would read?—

He shall call by proclamation into the military service of the United States—

Instead of—

He shall draft into the military service of the United States.

Mr. HAY. The trouble about that is that it is the nature of the troops that we are dealing with. Now he can call volunteers into the service of the United States, but this language is necessary in order that they may cease to be militia.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of putting into the RECORD certain figures showing what happened the last time we had a draft in this country. I am in favor of this provision, but I do not think we will get all out of it that we hope.

The enrollment act of March 3, 1863, was the act under which the draft took place in the Civil War. There were 766,000 men drafted, of whom there were finally held to service 46,347.

Out of that 776,000, not counting substitutes, the North secured a little over 46,000 men by the draft. Now, here is a statement of what became of the rest: Out of those 776,000 161,000 failed to report, 46,000 were discharged because the quotas from their localities were full, 47,000 were discharged by order, 315,000 were rejected, 73,000 furnished substitutes, 86,000 paid commutation, and only 46,347 were held to service.

In connection with some remarks which I made earlier in the day, in which I spoke of the bounties which were paid in the Civil War, I shall publish a letter from The Adjutant General. In that same letter from The Adjutant General will be found the statement as to the draft which I have just summarized.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield to my friend from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] the time reserved to me.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, I am constrained to speak for a moment by reason of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] relative to the draft. As this bill was drawn I do not believe that any American citizens, at least not in the country where I live, would take it as any mark of disrespect or dishonor that they shall be drafted into the service of the United States in time of need, when they themselves, by their own voluntary act, shall place themselves in such a position as to give their country the right to call upon them. In other words, while technically and legally this section may be referred to as a draft, yet in fact we should not lose sight of the proposition that these National Guardsmen, these men who have put themselves in training against that day when the country shall need their services, are in every true sense volunteering for the sake of their country. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] refers to the number of drafted men who hired substitutes during the Civil War. While I do not know as much about the National Guard, perhaps, as does the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], yet I have the honor to represent a district in the State of Missouri which, I believe, furnishes more men for the National Guard than any other part of the State. Gen. Clark, commander of the National Guard of Missouri, is a resident of my district. He is an able lawyer and a man of military training and experience. I know Col. Raupp, a hard-headed, patriotic business man, devoted to the training of the National Guard. I know the officers and most of the men in the National Guard in my district. They are brave and capable men, who spend their time willingly in order that they may be prepared to fight for their country when their country needs them; and I say to you that I believe the rest of the citizenship of the United States has the same patriotism, the same love of country, the same desire not only to live for the country, but to die for the country if need be, as the National Guard of my district. If that is so, then there will be no hired substitutes in the places of National Guardsmen when the war comes. [Applause.]

I am heartily in favor of this bill. The vital question in this bill, in my judgment, is not whether we shall have a standing Army of 100,000 men or a standing Army of 200,000 men. The former would mean one Regular soldier for every thousand citizens, the latter two Regular soldiers for every thousand citizens. The number finally authorized by law will be the result of conference between the Senate and House. Neither 100,000 soldiers nor 200,000 soldiers could stand against a modern European army. The vital merit of this bill consists not in the increase of the standing Army, but in the development, training, equipment, and federalizing of the National Guard, which ultimately will give us a large trained and efficient body of citizen soldiers, which is the safest reliance of a Republic in time of need.

It is true I would like to have heard a little more discussion and consideration of the question as to the use of the National Guard in time of strikes. I represent a great many miners who go down into the ground to dig for their daily bread, men who are just as brave as farmers, men who are just as brave as bankers and lawyers, men who are just as patriotic, who love the old flag just as much as you and I love the flag. These men when they join the National Guard sometimes have a fear that in the vicissitudes of political turmoil and industrial troubles they may be called upon to defend the Guggenheims and the Rockefellers instead of the flag. Of course, order should be preserved in case of labor disputes, but it seems to me provision could and should be made for this without calling on the National Guard, which should be recruited largely from laboring men who wish to be trained not to do police duty, but to defend their country when it needs defenders.

I congratulate the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], who has shown himself worthy of the title of a true Virginian when he helped to write this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. DECKER. I would like two minutes more.

Mr. HAY. If I could under the rule yield time to the gentleman I would be glad to do so, but I do not think I have the right to.

Mr. DECKER. In view of the fact that I wanted to say something good about the Military Committee, I thought the gentleman might give me the time. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HAY. In view of that I will yield the gentleman two minutes anyway. [Laughter.]

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, I speak not lightly, but with solemn earnestness, and I wish to commend the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] and the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], and all the members of this committee regardless of whether they are Republicans or Democrats. In this hour of turmoil and tragedy, in this hour when honest people are alarmed, in this hour when dangers seem to lurk on every hand, and also in this hour when there is much hysteria and when insidious influences are at work to embroil the United States in war, the members of this great committee of the House of Representatives, realizing their solemn responsibility, have played their parts in the destiny of their country. I congratulate the members of this committee because they have had the courage, brains, and patriotism to write a bill which not only protects our Nation against danger from abroad but also does what Republics should ever do, guards against dangers from within. [Applause.]

I congratulate this committee because with patriotic bravery they have done their duty, and have upheld the hands, and not only upheld the hands, but also helped to guide the hands of that great President, who, like Abraham Lincoln, toils and prays for the perpetuity of this Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. HAY. The Clerk will read. I do not care to say anything more.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS). The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 77. That in time of war or public danger, when two or more officers of the same grade are on duty in the same field, department, or command, or of organizations thereof, the President may assign the command of the forces of such field, department, or command, or of any organization thereof, without regard to seniority of rank in the same grade: Provided, That in the absence of such assignment by the President officers of the same grade shall take rank and have precedence in the following order, without regard to dates of rank of commissions, as between officers of different classes, namely: First, officers of the Regular Army and officers of the Marine Corps detached for service with the Army by order of the President; second, former officers of the National Guard drafted into the service of the United States; third, all other officers in the military service of the United States, who shall take rank among themselves in their respective grades according to the dates of their entry into the service of the United States in those grades: Provided further, That officers of the Regular Army holding commissions in organizations composed of men drafted or called into the service of the United States from the National Guard, or in the Volunteer forces, shall take rank and have precedence under said commissions as if they were commissions in the Regular Army; but the rank of officers of the Regular Army under their commissions in such organizations shall not, for the purpose of this section, be held to antedate their formal entry into the service of the United States under said commissions.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 85, line 6, after the words "war or," strike out the words "public danger" and insert in lieu thereof the words "when war is imminent."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered merely for the sake of uniformity. I do not care to discuss it.

Mr. HAY. We will accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, on March 20, 1916, there was printed in some of the papers a statement by one Lord Robert Cecil, British minister of war trade, in which he called the milk agitation in America "dishonest and insincere." As I am the father of a resolution asking relief for the starving infants of the central powers, and as Lord Cecil's remarks are full of insinuations and hypotheses, I feel myself entitled to again address the House for a few moments in behalf of my pro-American and prohumanitarian move, and thereby to refute the statements of Lord Cecil.

In the first place I want to say that I resent the attempt of any lord to brand as dishonest and insincere the efforts of American citizens to serve the cause of humanity by attempting to save the lives of helpless babies who are innocent victims of a milk blockade. In the second place, I want to say that I resent Lord Cecil's insinuation that we Americans are unable to judge where to place our sympathy and aid; that we leap before we look; and that we need in our philanthropic undertakings the guardianship of foreigners. In the third place, I wish to say that all the arguments which Lord Cecil can marshal to show why the babies of Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Poland should not be starving or should be allowed to starve are of no value whatever if the fact is that the babies of those countries are actually starving for lack of milk.

Lord Cecil in the course of his remarks says that a Mr. Hoover's commission is sending into "the occupied area of northern France" 3,000,000 tins of condensed milk monthly to keep alive the thousands of French babies whose sources of supply have been taken from them. He adds:

Without this fund and the work of a neutral commission these French babies would be dying of starvation.

Even were it true that the Germans had attempted to starve French babies—and this charge seems to be a new one, on the spur of the moment—Lord Cecil's argument is the old barbarous argument of retaliation against the innocent, and should be rejected with disgust. Even were it true that Germany should have taken milk for her own babies, France has access to the markets of the world.

Lord Cecil again says:

I am informed through sources of unimpeachable veracity and expert knowledge—

Which he does not name—

that the Germans have been most zealous in the maintenance of their original capital of cattle to such an extent that probably less, rather than more, milch cows have been slaughtered during the war than in normal times.

He shows how this so-called "capital of cattle" has been increased by many thousands of cattle "stolen from Belgium and northern France" and in the next breath contradicts himself by saying that these "stolen cattle" were "slaughtered in greater part." He fails to note that the Russians in their retreats from Poland and Prussia slew or drove away the vast herds of cattle in those sections.

Lord Cecil again says:

If the deficiency in imported milk has not been made up, it is not our fault. As a matter of fact, Germany confesses that it has been made up.

And this is how Germany confesses, according to his notion:

The Cologne Gazette of January 4 states that an investigation of the health of 2,500 school children in Goettingen shows their health to be perhaps better than in peace times.

Does this prove that the babies of Germany do not need milk? We are not trying to ship milk to children old enough to go to school. Such children do not need milk to live. We want to bring milk to the starving babies.

Lord Cecil again says:

Germany is touched by the greatest milk-producing countries in Europe, and it is idle to contend that she is not still getting supplies from these sources.

It is more idle to contend that Germany is getting supplies from these surrounding countries than to contend that she is not. The countries surrounding Germany are either hostile and will not ship milk or are prevented from so exporting to Germany through prohibitive trade deals.

Lord Cecil again says:

Last of all, we must consider the question of fodder. Of course cottonseed cake and similar imports have been stopped, but we have good grounds for believing that this shortage has been met by the slaughter of bulls, leaving a larger proportion of fodder to supply cows, etc.

I do not believe that the lord has any figures on the slaughter of bulls. I believe all of what he says is what the word implies. I believe it is all a pure invention to cloud the issue.

Lord Cecil says:

Germany has the effrontery to include in her appeals for milk distressing descriptions of the shortage of milk in Poland.

We shall see in a moment whether there is cause for distressing descriptions when we hear the testimony of Americans on that point.

I feel myself at this time, Mr. Chairman, entitled to present some facts at my command which show the actual conditions in the central powers. In considering the milk situation I have done so in the light of facts at hand and not in the light of weird speculations and deductions.

The strongest evidence we have at hand is that of our honored countryman, Judge Ben B. Lindsey, who recently returned from Germany, where he made a careful investigation of milk conditions. In his statement before an audience in the Casino Theater, in New York City, February 27, 1916, he said:

More than a million persons who never shouldered rifle or heard the sound of cannon have died in Germany as a result of this war. I am told that more than one-half of these were babies. In many towns and cities of 30,000 or 40,000 in Poland there is not a baby alive under 3 years of age and in many places not a child under 10 years of age, so terrible has been the demand for milk. * * * I saw no signs that the adults were suffering by the blockade of food supplies, but I did see many signs that the baby population was affected by the lack of milk. * * * One of the most gripping scenes I ever witnessed, and one that I shall carry with me until my dying day, was the sight one day of a long line of mothers with tiny babies in their arms waiting to be supplied with milk. I saw the splendid sanitary equipment and other arrangements for handling the milk bottles and caring for milk, but I saw no milk. The supply for the day had given out, and still there were hundreds of mothers left in line, who must pray for milk on the morrow, for milk to keep their babies alive. I saw the tear-stained faces of those mothers as they turned away, not knowing whether the little bit of life in their babies would be sustained until the morrow.

We have the further testimony of Roy S. MacElwee, who until recently was specially attached to the American consulate in Berlin. He says:

It will please me very much if the newspapers will correct a misstatement that appeared in some of the newspapers the day I arrived. In answer to the question, Are the babies of Berlin starving for want of milk? I was quoted as saying that "no babies in Germany are starving." This statement, if allowed to go unanswered, will give a false impression. There is a tremendous shortage of milk and all its products in Berlin and all over Germany, and the babies are suffering greatly. In Austria-Hungary conditions are worse than in Germany, and in Poland I understand that milk is practically an unknown quantity. The wholesale killing of the cattle by the retreating Russians is directly responsible for the condition in Poland. Mr. Hirshfield, traveling for the Jewish societies of New York, came back from Poland and brought a letter written to him by a German regimental pastor. This letter, among other things, told of the suffering in Poland, and stated that at one time his service was interrupted by the poor mothers of the town coming up to the altar on their knees holding up their babies and saying: "Take our babies and save their lives; we can die." I can say positively that nothing would be more acceptable in Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Poland than American condensed milk.

One letter which slipped past the German censorship shows vividly the milk famine in upper Silesia:

For Heaven's sake, have pity on us and send us milk. My little boy is eight months old. He is but a skeleton, and I have no food for him. How can he survive? The two older children are trying to comfort me, saying: "Mother, dear, we'll bear it if God will keep you and the little brother and our dear father."

Official recognition of the milk shortage is contained in the official North German Gazette on a number of dates.

The New York Evening Mail of March 1, 1916, printed an editorial on "What Lindsey saw." It quotes this passage from Judge Lindsey:

Never shall I forget the sight of the hundreds of women gathered in a room, who, having suckled their own babies, were nursing the babies of others in the hope of saving those children from starvation until another day could bring new supplies of milk from the dairies.

And then, referring to Lindsey's statement that there was a lack of milk and its derivative products, the editorial goes on to say:

This sort of testimony, which has come from many other sources, has puzzled many persons, who can not understand why Germany's milk supply should be short. They forget that Germany has not been a grazing country. She had 10,000,000 cows before the war, but these were fed to a considerable extent on imported feed, particularly the oil cake and cottonseed meal, which Germany adopted as a dairy ration before the farmers of this country began to use it for that purpose. Now, of course, the importation of these feeds from Russia, Egypt, and America is cut off. Even with the great supply of cows which she had Germany before the war imported annually about 75,000 tons of milk from Denmark, France, and Russia. The supply from Denmark has been cut off, partly because of Denmark's own lack of imported feed, partly because of the insistence of England that Denmark shall not interfere with the allies' plan of starving the enemy. The result has been that Germany, even by forbidding adults to use milk, has not been able to secure enough milk for the babies. There are in Germany about 7,400,000 babies of the milk-consuming age. There is available about four-fifths of the amount of milk required to feed them. No other food can be used as a substitute, and the actual shortage amounts to 600,000 quarts a year.

Prof. Larsen, of Pennsylvania State College, who is also secretary of the Official Dairy Instructors' Association, submits a scientific report on the milk situation in Germany which reveals it as a professional dairyman knows it must be. This report can be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Friday, February 18, 1916, on pages 3024 and 3025.

Lord Cecil concludes his remarks with the following:

I have been unable to find any evidence of honesty in the German claims that there are babies suffering for lack of milk. The whole agitation is wholly a political move designed to discredit us.

I want to ask Lord Cecil if he can find any evidence of honesty in the American claims that there are babies suffering for lack of milk? I want to ask this British lord whether he believes Judge Lindsey to be dishonest when he tells us of the terrible suffering among the babies in Germany? Whether he believes the other Americans so testifying are dishonest? I want to ask the lord whether in the face of his testimony and in the face of our testimony he can afford to deliberately insult a great number of prominent American citizens by calling them dishonest and insincere because they want to aid starving babies? I want to throw it into his teeth. Are the great committees in New York, in Chicago, in Massachusetts and other States and cities which are seeking to aid the starving babies dishonest and insincere? They are all Americans. Are such people as Mrs. Samuel Untermyer, the Archbishop of Chicago, Mrs. Fritz Achelis, Dr. Henry J. Wolf, Carl L. Schurz, Dr. Willy Myer, and other men and women among the most respected in America all dishonest and insincere? To call them that would be preposterous, and yet he has done it. He has insulted many Senators and Representatives who are interested in the cause of the babies.

And yet for all that we in the name of humanity shall continue our efforts—we Americans. I can feel strong sympathy from all over this country. We have a move on foot to send a boat full of condensed milk to Germany under American Red Cross supervision. It would be eminently just. If the babies do not need the milk, it will not be distributed; if they do, as we honestly believe they do, it will be distributed. I do not believe the people of England or France or Russia or Italy will object. It remains to be seen whether the Governments of those countries will.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I do so in order to put in the RECORD an address made on February 19, 1916, by the prime minister of the Commonwealth of Australia, Hon. William M. Hughes. This address was delivered in Ottawa about a month ago, when Mr. Hughes was traveling across Canada.

Premier Hughes is the head of the Australian Labor Party. He has been a real labor leader. He was general secretary of Wharf Laborers' Union, president of the Carters' Union of New South Wales, and president of the Waterside Workers' Federation.

I submit a copy of his address:

CANADIAN CLUB MEETING, NO. 19, CHATEAU LAURIER, OTTAWA, FEBRUARY 19, 1916.

[Address by Hon. William M. Hughes, prime minister of the Commonwealth of Australia.]

Your royal highness, Mr. President, gentlemen, I feel myself today a very proud and honored man at the reception that this Canadian people have given to me as a representative of the sister Dominion of Australia. It is with a sense of profound satisfaction that I find myself in this picturesque and beautiful city, separated by thousands of miles of land and water from the land which is mine, yet amongst friends, whose ideals are in unison with our own, whose friendly reception could not be warmer if I were not only your kinsman, but your very brother. [Applause.] In doing me honor you have honored Australia.

This dreadful war found the Empire unprepared. It was forced upon us. By no act of ours did we provoke it. We neither anticipated nor desired it. No people in the world desired war less than those who make up that congeries of nations which we designate by the term "British Empire." We were, and are by instinct, a peaceful people. ["Hear!" "Hear!"] We may best be described as a civilized people. [Applause.] And no clearer distinction can be drawn between us and that great nation with which we are now locked in deadly struggle than this; the British Nation stands for the highest ideals of civilization. [Applause.] What Germany stands for, let its deeds in this war speak for themselves. This is a war of ideals. There is not an ideal cherished by us or by a Britisher anywhere that finds an answering echo in the minds of the enemy. With them might is right. There is between the ideals of Britain and Germany a gulf as wide as divides heaven from hell—right from wrong.

The issues at stake are vital and the fate of the world hangs upon them. And the peoples of the earth, although some may look on with an air of indifference and hold themselves aloof, are being enveloped, against their will, in this great struggle, which, like some great tidal wave, sweeps resistlessly over the whole earth and can not be dammed here or there by the act of any man or any nation. The destiny of the world is to-day trembling in the balance ["Hear!" "Hear!"], and every nation, every man, must make up its mind on which side it shall take its stand. [Loud applause.]

This war will leave the world very different from what it found it. There were many of us drifting along pleasant, profitable channels. The call of duty fell dully on our ears. We turned our backs on the purifying waters of self-sacrifice. This war has come at once as a mighty spur, a sedative, a corrective perhaps needed by our race for its salvation. At any rate it has come. It will profoundly affect the destiny of our race; it will profoundly affect the destiny of the whole world. ["Hear!" "Hear!"] If by any malign stroke of fate the issue should turn against us, the clock of civilization would be set back a hundred years. The outlook of mankind would be profoundly changed. Evil would have overcome good. Force would have trampled upon right. We should fall back into what, although it might be disguised under the thin veneer of kultur, would nevertheless be a real state of barbarism, for barbarism does not differ from civilization in appearance but in reality. Not by their garments alone do civilized men differ from barbarians, but in their thoughts, in their outlook upon life, in their conduct, and by the acceptance of the standard of right, not might. [Cheers.]

We have gone out to battle with the enemy. Out of evil cometh good. The war fell upon an Empire menaced with turmoil, but at the first rattling of the saber turmoil died down, dissension ceased: we were a united people. ["Hear!" "Hear!"] There is not from Dan to Beersheba, from one end of this mighty Empire to the other, where the people do not stand four-square against their common enemy. [Applause.] This war has welded together by bonds that time will not dissolve, that nothing but our own incredible folly can wholly break asunder; this war has welded as by magic that loose federation known as the British Empire into one homogeneous nation. [Applause.]

I come here as the representative of a sister Dominion to you after some 18 months of war. During that time Australians and Canadians have on the field of battle proved that the ancient valor of their sires still burns in their veins. Mr. Thomas said something about our Australian soldiers I could say as much about the Canadian. Canadian and Australian have both proved themselves to be men. They have realized clearly that this war is not one that concerns Britain only, but is a war which affects our very existence as free men. [Applause.] I stand here to-day as the chosen representative of the most democratic government in the world: I stand here as a representative of labor [applause], and all the ideals that you and I jointly cherish—and those ideals that are peculiar to labor—all these, I say, rest upon the foundations of liberty and must fall if we lose this battle. We in Australia and you here in Canada have fought, are fighting, and shall continue to fight to the end, for those free institutions which to free men are dearer than life itself. We fight not for material wealth, not for aggrandizement of empire, but for the right for every nation, small as well as large, to live its own life in its own way. [Applause.] We fight for those free institutions upon which democratic government rests.

In Australia what the people say goes; whatever they choose to make, that they can make. But in the country against which we are fighting to-day the will of the German proletariat, though 10,000,000, though 50,000,000, stand behind it, is as nothing beside the ukase of the Kaiser. Liberty does not dare to venture into that cold and chilling atmosphere. I do not speak of that poor pallid cadaver of liberty that slinks through the land surrounded by the Prussian guards. In this country, in England, in Australia, our ancestors have fought and died for liberty. Those intrepid men, French and English, who founded this country endured incredible hardships in order that they might breathe freely the bracing air of freedom. They came here because tyranny was unendurable to them. They came to found in this great country a New World, over which the spirit of liberty might keep eternal watch and ward. They left their country, which to them was very dear, in order that they might have liberty, which was dearer still. We fight, therefore, in this war for liberty. We fight for those free democratic institutions without which life as we know it would lose its savor. With Germany victorious we should live—yes! But we should not live as free men! We in the Dominions could have purchased an ignoble peace had we been willing to pay the price, to bend the knee to Baal. If we had but abased ourselves before this mighty Moloch, all would have been well. They were prepared to treat Canada as a separate nation. They were prepared to hold out the hand of friendship to Australia. Yes; they were prepared to deal with us, and even with Britain, as the man-eating tiger in the jungle deals with its victim, taking each in turn. [Applause.] But, although we are a peace-loving people, and have slumbered in this lotus land for many years, we have, thank God, not lost the spirit of free men. The valor of our forefathers courses swiftly through our veins, and Canadians and Australians have proved themselves on the field of battle in this war of Armageddon to be worthy of the mettle of their pasture. To-day Germany knows that when she fights England she fights not merely the 45,000,000 people in England, but those other millions scattered throughout the world—men of adventure, men of resolute, determined purpose, who will fight to the bitter end alongside of those who gave them birth, to whom they owe those institutions of free government and ideals that are part of the warp and woof of our race. [Applause.]

I feel I stand here to-day in the reflected glory of the Australian soldier. I never speak—I can not speak—of his bravery but what I choke with emotion. You speak of the charge of Balaklava. There men went out in the broad light of day, with all the impetus and stimulus that a knee-to-knee charge, on splendid horses, gives to men. But the story of the Eighth Light Horse of Australia is one by which the charge of the Light Brigade must pale its ineffectual fires. These men—there were some 800 of them—were detailed, and they were to go over in four waves. They were given their orders 6, 8, 10 hours before. Every man of them knew that the order meant almost certain death. They went without question, without hesitation. They made their preparations. They handed to those who were to remain in the trench their poor, brief messages of farewell, and then they went out, wave after wave, to die; they were shot down almost as soon as they crossed the parapet. The man who got the farthest was the colonel; he got 50 yards. [Applause.] The first wave was shot down; the second and third followed; the fourth was ready, but was ordered to remain in the trench. Out of those 500 who went 15 only survived! We must look back in the gray dawn of history before we find a deed parallel with such a deed! It was not inspired by the spirit of valor, not heroism, but by that of sacrifice. The Spartans at Thermophylæ have left a name which the ages have not dimmed and which shall remain when the pyramids shall crumble to dust; but surely what these Australian soldiers did that day, these citizen soldiers of a new nation, the last but one in the family of the Great British Empire, what these men did, too, will never die. [Prolonged applause.]

We have fought and we are fighting this battle as if it were a battle of life and death. It is a battle of life and death. We did not enter it lightly, nor shall we quit it while life remains in us. We have sent out of the country to the European or Asiatic battle fields, to the first week in February, 145,000 men. [Applause.] We have enlisted to the first week in February 240,000 men. We shall have enlisted by the beginning of June 300,000 men. [Applause.] The Australian is coming from the workshop, the farm, the ranch, and the desk to do battle for the country that has made him what he is. Australia is a great country. Its immense hinterland is almost like your own. It is a country of tremendous distances. It is a country in which free men live and can thrive. It is a country in which men imbibe the spirit of liberty through every pore. It breeds men who would rather die than lose liberty. They are coming out, these men, nurtured in a free air, raised amidst the freest institutions of democratic government in the world, they are coming out to do battle for the country that has given them birth and made them what they are. They are showing to-day the mettle of their pasture. They are fighting for everything they hold dear. By land and sea Australia has done, and is doing, what it can. [Applause.] It is a battle to the death. It is a battle from which we are to emerge triumphant, with our great Empire welded indissolubly together, or in which we must go down with all prospects of achieving our destiny forever damned. I have no doubt, nor has any Australian any doubt, of what the result may be. Britain and her allies at the outset of this fight were caught at a disadvantage. We were like peaceful citizens taken unaware by thugs and bandits. [Applause.] But they are gradually mustering their tremendous resources. Britain is turning her men of peace into men of war. She is gathering against our great opponent—and I pay every tribute to the bravery of the great German nation, to its tenacity, to its power of initiative, which we thought crushed out of it; I pay all that ungrudgingly. She is building up against it, massing up against it the tremendous resources of a free people who will die to the last man rather than they will be defeated. [Cheers.]

And we shall win. We have encircled this tremendous and ferocious foe with a wall of steel which, despite her most frantic efforts, she can not break. [Applause.] We have shut up her great navy, so that its ships are but inglorious canal boats [laughter] while ours roam at will undisputed mistress of the seas. The part played by the British Navy in this war can never be exaggerated. Under the shadow of its mighty wing you and I and all of us draw our breath free men; the blast of war has never been heard on these favored shores. Australia lies to-day a veritable jewel in the Pacific Ocean, and not the most distant rumble of this Homeric conflict has been heard on her shores. The British Navy has done its part well. [Applause.] It has saved the Empire and it has saved civilization. [Loud applause.]

Every one of us must thank God and the patron saint of our nation that there were men in England who turned a deaf ear to the "Little Navy" party. To-day we live as free men because there were those who did not believe that the lion could ever lie down with the lamb. They did not believe these professions of friendship, these philanthropic exhibitions of sentiment. They did not believe, as some admirable people believed, that the day had come when the bell of universal peace was heard in the land. They did not believe that the sword had been beaten into the plowshare, and so they worked quietly, persistently, but effectively. And because of that we live to-day as free men. [Applause.] Let us look at the thing fairly, consider what Canadians and Australians owe to the power of Britain on the seas. Unless we had purchased temporary safety by basely abandoning Britain in her hour of need, few of us would have been living to-day and the death knell of freedom would have sounded in our ears. [Applause.] The British Navy was prepared. We have turned from our peaceful avocations. And so we live and live as free men under the shelter of its wing; we are doing what men can do to defend their country and their liberties. We have concentrated our tremendous potential forces for this one purpose.

We are in the eighteenth month of the war. The submarine menace is still with us, but it is a menace which has shot its bolt. It has been powerless to affect more than 1 per cent of the mighty mercantile marine of Britain. From the most distant seas her argosies cleave their way undismayed. To her shores they are going from distant Australia and the Canadian coast, carrying grain, provisions, ammunitions, everything necessary for the successful prosecution of this war. The German Navy, built for our destruction, is locked within the narrow waters of its home. [Applause.]

It had been very well for us and very well for mankind if Britain had prepared as well by land as by sea. ["Hear!" "Hear!"] If she had done that there would have been no war to-day. And this I say—and it is all that I shall say on this point—that Australia has been able to do what she has done because we have adopted as the corner stone of our democratic edifice the system of compulsory military training. [Applause.] We believe that there is but one way by which a nation, being free, can remain so, and that is that every man shall not only be willing to defend his country, but be able to do so. [Applause.] And we think that if it is right—as it surely is—that a democracy should educate its citizens so that the franchise shall be wisely exercised, for government by the many, if the many are not educated, is a doubtful good, so we think that the State should train the citizen so that he may be able to defend his country, his home, and his liberties. The defense of one's country is the primary duty of citizenship. It is the first duty of free men. Two years before the outbreak of war we had established in Australia a system of universal military training. To this we owe that complex and widespread organization for training officers, noncommissioned officers, manufacturing small arms, ammunition, clothing, and so on, without which we should have been almost helpless in this great struggle. A small community of under 5,000,000 of people yet we have been able to train, to equip from head to foot, a great army of men. It is a great thing and one which we may mention with pride and satisfaction that Canada and Australia have together put into the field nearly twice the number of the original British expeditionary force. [Applause.] We have put close on 300,000 men between us of first-class fighting men in the field. Australia could not have done her part unless we had a great organization created to prepare for danger. This one lesson must be learned from this great war. Some day the wings of the dove of peace may beat a soft lullaby throughout the land. But that day is not yet. Until that day dawns it is the duty of free men to be able as well as to be willing to defend their country. ["Hear!" "Hear!"] Neither liberty nor our national rights can ever be safe when we neglect the defense of our country. This is a primary duty of citizenship of a free country. Nor can it be safe if we intrust it to volunteers. It can not be ignored nor left to volunteers. For as it concerns all so must it apply to all. Liberty, the very basis upon which our national edifice rests; liberty, the very breath of our being; liberty, without which the mere material side of civilization is as a dry husk, must be defended by all. [Applause.] With that I leave it.

I thank you very sincerely indeed for the manner in which you have received every mention of Australia. I owe a thousand things to the citizens of this country and to its Government. The Government has done me the unique honor of making me a member of its privy council. [Prolonged cheers.] I hold that honor in trust for the Australian nation. It is in this warm-hearted and generous manner, characteristic of the Canadian people, that they display their friendship to their sister Dominion. I owe the Government of Canada many thanks for a thousand courtesies. I shall leave this country with very great regret. I came into it when even its western slopes were covered with a mantle of snow. I have traveled 3,000 miles through it. I don't know, I have not yet been able to grasp, how many more miles I shall have to go to get to the Atlantic coast [laughter], but I suppose, eventually, if one went far enough one would get there. Yours is a country of almost limitless extent, of great resources, inhabited by a most virile people, tenacious of purpose, and inspired with a profound belief in the future of Canada. ["Hear!" "Hear!"] I have a profound conviction in its great destiny. Believe me, my friends, this club has performed a great national function by creating the means whereby the national spirit of Canada can express itself. [Applause.] Here, so the president tells me, you hear both sides. I am not altogether sure that this is always a pleasant thing. Sometimes it is not. [Laughter.] I shall leave this country with very great regret, cheered with the hope that ere very long, when I return from England, it may be my privilege to come through it again. [Applause.] I thank you very much indeed on behalf of the Government of the Commonwealth and people of Australia. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a new section, at end of section 77, a new section as follows:

"SEC. 77½. Service in the National Guard shall be considered military service within the meaning of section 1754, Revised Statutes of the United States, and the preference right therein granted shall extend to persons who shall have served in the National Guard."

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, in order that the committee may understand this amendment, I want to read the section referred to and the instructions placed thereon issued by the Civil Service Commission. This is taken from the Manual of Examinations issued by the Civil Service Commission:

Section 1754 of the Revised Statutes provides that persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds received or sickness incurred in the line of duty shall be preferred for appointments to the civil-service offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices. A person who has been allowed preferences by the commission has the following advantages: (a) He is released from all age limitations; (b) he has to attain an average percentage only of 65 to be eligible, while for all others the average percentage required is 70; (c) having attained an average percentage of 65, his name is placed upon the register above, and is certified before those of persons who have not been allowed preference; and (d) he is released from the law and rules relating to apportionment of appointments.

I apprehend that one of the difficulties that will be encountered in future in time of peace will be the recruiting of the full number of the militia. It is undoubtedly a fact that when there is war or rumors of war the American youth are patriotic and will volunteer in large numbers, but in the piping times of peace, the inducements offered by this bill may not be sufficient to recruit the militia or National Guard up to the full quota required. As an additional inducement for getting enlistments under this new National Guard law, I propose to so enlarge section 1754, which gives preference right to those honorably discharged from the military or naval service of the United States because of disabilities incurred in line of duty, to those who have been discharged from the militia on account of disability incurred in line of service. I believe there should be an additional inducement to young men to enlist in the militia, for if they were disabled it is true they might get a pension, but everyone knows that a pension granted is not sufficient, and they will thus be given employment in the civil service of the United States the same as honorably discharged soldiers from the military and naval service. It seems to me that no reasonable objection can be raised to the proposition.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will not be adopted, because, in the first place, it would not lend very much encouragement to people to enlist in the National Guard, as it only applies where they have incurred some disability, as I understaad, in the line of service. In the next place, I think it will be quite a blow to the civil service of the country if that proposition were put in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 78. That the President of the United States shall make all necessary rules and regulations and issue such orders as may be necessary for the thorough organization, discipline, and government of the militia provided for in this act.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. There appeared in the New York Herald on March 12, 1916, a very able article by Maj. C. B. Blethen, of the National Guard of the State of Washington, regarding the upbuilding of a volunteer force in the United States. Maj. Blethen has organized a great many National Guard companies, and is thoroughly familiar with the guard. He is the holder of the six possible certificates of proficiency granted by the War Department to the officers of the Coast Artillery Militia. I desire to print in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the article referred to, which is as follows:

Even previous to the completion of the Military Committees' bills and Villa's dash into Columbus, as a people we had finally made up our minds that we should be prepared to prevent invasion and to uphold our dignity among nations. Immediately deadlock developed. How could we do it?

I know it is against the rules to suggest the easiest way. Conscience says the easiest way is never best. American history shows the student that we have habitually taken the easiest way to meet our wars—that the result has been incredibly expensive in lives and money. The Civil War alone cost $10,000,000,000 more than would have its prevention—and all those thousands of lives!

Directly after each national disturbance has subsided we have brought our Military Establishment down to an irreducible minimum. Each time we have said to ourselves: "There's an easy way; we can always raise volunteers." And in every subsequent conflict we have taken that easy way, with the result that we have been compelled to go through 18 years of unnecessary wars! This, as Gen. Upton says in his authoritative work on the Military Policy of the United States, a Government publication, does not include the smaller Indian wars, but takes in the Civil War, entirely preventable; five unnecessary years of the Revolutionary War, two wasted years of the War of 1812, six months of the Creek War, six years of the Florida War, and one year of the Mexican War. Aside from the Civil War it has cost the United States four times as much in money alone to meet our enemies by the "easy" volunteer system as it would have cost to be prepared before the emergency came and to remain prepared down through the Spanish-American muss.

EASIEST WAY BEST NOW.

But there has come a time at last when the easiest way is best. We can throw away the rules; we can take the easiest road. For now, when we know that calamity is surely coming if we do not prepare to prevent real invasion—not piffling raiding of the Villa type—at the conclusion of the great war, or perhaps sooner, out of the tangle of conflicting opinions comes the way. And this way is the easiest road to preparedness and the best.

The plans so far brought to congressional attention include universal conscription, improving the National Guard System, federalizing the guard, doubling the size of the standing Army, the continental army scheme, and a variety of ways of strengthening the Navy.

The first half of the "easy way" requires that our Navy shall be placed upon a fighting footing second only to Great Britain, and that this shall be done at once, with the idea that 15 or 20 years from now we should occupy first place among naval powers. To place the Navy on a proper fighting footing we need as much as we need battleships, battle cruisers, submarines, and destroyers, an adequate supply of auxiliary vessels, including colliers, more colliers, and still more colliers; and ammunition, mountains of ammunition, more ammunition, and better means of storing and distributing it than any other power.

The naval part of the program is conceded by everybody. The second half of the easiest way is now first suggested, and therefore is not included in the schemes before Congress, perhaps because it is so simple, possibly because it would tread on so many political toes.

While I have listed universal conscription among the plans that have been discussed in official Washington, it is necessary to add that it has never more than been hinted at; it has been over the conversational net, only to be batted out of the court of discussion as a dead ball. America may some day awake to the absolute and unavoidable necessity of universal service, but not yet. Therefore this is neither the easy way nor a feasible one.

MORE PAY NECESSARY.

Improving the National Guard system by federalization, by the militia pay bill, or any other method will not meet the issue. The pay bill will help. I think most National Guard officers will agree with me that if we had enough Federal pay, from private up, simply to keep us, as I have said elsewhere, from "paying for the privilege" of serving, we could increase the number of effectives enrolled in the various States from 128,000 to 250,000. If in addition to this our officers were commissioned by the Federal Government instead of by the States, the personnel would be improved and the number of men who lead in private life and are willing to train themselves and be trained as officers would be increased. Further, if the system of instruction and training could then be federalized, if the Government could force the creation of the necessary auxiliary forces, such as Cavalry, Field Artillery, machine-gun detachments, engineers, transport and sanitary troops, with proper equipment and find a way to train officers and men assigned to the duties of transport and supply, we would have a very efficient force of its size.

TOO MANY STANDARDS.

Now, what's wrong with the idea? Many things.

Not enough will agree that the pay system is good. The States can not be forced or persuaded to provide the auxiliary forces. The difficulties of making the systems of training in vogue conform with one standard, as long as there are four dozen separate State organizations and administrations, are insurmountable.

And the result would not be nearly adequate to the requirements. Why, Switzerland under her wonderful system has more than 500,000 trained soldiers. Compare her area and population with ours!

We want and must have an Army big enough to defend us successfully the minute the war comes, and not an Army to serve as a model for a real army to be created after the war has begun. We want to be able to call 2,000,000 men into the field when they are needed, not a total of 400,000—150,000 Regulars and 250,000 militia—to be destroyed in sections by a machine-trained enemy.

To understand the way here suggested for providing a sufficient body of troops for the land defense of this country it is necessary to understand exactly how the present futile system is worked.

We have on paper about a hundred and twenty-eight thousand Organized Militia. These are State troops and are under the control of the State officials. The constitutional limitations to their service are well understood; it is not practicable to use the National Guard in time of war as at present constituted, except under their own officers and for sharply defined purposes of defense, as we probably will find out immediately on the Mexican border. Now, this 128,000 men is conceded by all guardsmen and adjutants general to be about the most that can be induced to enter the service of the various States. Without discussing the question of how many of these men are properly trained or how many actually would be available in time of war, consider the inducements that are offered them to become members of the National Guard.

OFFER SOCIAL INDUCEMENTS.

Large armories are provided. Many of these are nothing short of palatial. The poorest furnish actual clubrooms for young men who would have no other places to spend their hours of leisure except pool rooms or saloons. All furnish social inducements under conditions that can not but make membership attractive. Practically all have gymnasiums of various kinds. Shower baths and swimming pools are common. Athletics under careful supervision and with competitive conditions to bring out all there is in a man are a regular feature of every organization.

Character building and physical training are necessary, natural, component parts of the work. And the two-week camps out of doors under the finest kind of sanitary conditions are exceedingly attractive to the average young man.

With all these advantages, we have what? Only 128,000 men enlisted out of the 30,000,000 in the United States 21 years of age or more! To bring the point closer home, there are about 4,000,000 males 18, 19, and 20 years of age and 8,000,000 or 9,000,000 more not yet 30 years of age! Why aren't more of them in the militia?

My experience as a recruiting officer enables me to answer that question authoritatively. I must have talked with hundreds—at thousands—in organizing one company of militia and helping others.

The bulk of those who don't come in stay out because of the discipline involved. Obeying orders, even the orders of a physical instructor, is distasteful. We are an undisciplined people, and the idea of being told to do things is abhorrent.

The reason next in importance is inertia—laziness. There is unnecessary work involved. It is something that one doesn't have to do, so why do it?

The next most important reason, a reason given by a larger class than would be expected, is that it would be beneath the individual's dignity. In other words, we have many thousands of young men who look down on the militia.

FEARED BY UNIONS.

One of the big reasons is the labor unionist's fear that he would be used against his fellow employees in time of strikes. From his standpoint this is a perfectly legitimate reason.

An exceedingly large class stay out because of the period of enlistment. Thousands would come in if they could leave whenever they chose. This class can not be made to believe that removal from the State, illness, night employment, and similar legitimate excuses will procure honorable discharges.

A very few are prevented from entering because of night work, or because outside the regular hours of toil their time is taken up with additional home tasks.

A large number are deterred by the fear that they may be ordered to attend summer camps or some other activity at times when employers can not spare them, and with them should be classed those who can not afford to take even two weeks a year from their jobs at the rate of pay offered the militia.

The militia is trained by its own officers, under the supervision of Regular Army officers detailed to the various States as "inspector-instructors." Theoretically, each unit has about 40 drills a year in the armories and two weeks in camp for field maneuvers. In addition, each man is supposed to appear on the rifle ranges and be instructed in small-arms shooting. Actually the average individual does not, I dare say, get in 20 periods per year of armory instruction. The Division of Military Affairs has the figures on the number of men who are actually taken to the camps—probably not 65 per cent of the whole. And as for shooting on the ranges, I understand that one State with more than a thousand infantrymen has only 7 per cent qualified as marksmen.

PRACTICE MARCHES RARE.

Practice marches are exceedingly rare. Field maneuvers usually are undertaken only under the most propitious conditions of weather.

Now that we are confronted with the necessity of doing something, let us consider what has been offered. First, the continental army. This was sponsored by Secretary Garrison, and because of its failure to win support in Congress he resigned.

Last year the experiment of business men's instruction camps was made in various sections of the country, the most notable at Plattsburg. Volunteers from all walks of life poured out. In western Washington, at the fag-end of summer, when most business men had taken what vacations they could afford, and on eight days' notice, a successful camp was organized. But there were no uniforms, rifles, or other necessary equipment available. How these were supplied is another story. They were supplied, under conditions emphasizing the necessity of having instantly available in all parts of the country rifles, ammunition, tents, and all other equipment. For had this business men's camp been a group of volunteers rushing to the defense of our homes, they would have had nothing with which to fight or live save bare hands!

The alacrity with which the men who attended these various camps responded to the call may or may not have had something to do with the conception of the continental army scheme. Be that as it may, the plan was broached, partially explained in the newspapers, and the then Assistant Secretary of War, Henry Breckinridge, journeyed out to the Pacific coast to explain it to the National Guard Convention, which had assembled for the annual meeting in San Francisco.

AMAZED BY SCHEME.

Blank amazement greeted the official outlining of the plan. It was purposed to raise a new volunteer army, in groups, larger than the entire existing National Guard each year. How? It was purposed to officer them. How? It was purposed to give them two months' intensive training each year. How?

There was no answer to any of the three big questions. On the other hand, the guard was told that any officer or organization that desired could come over from the State militia to the new continental army or Federal militia. In other words, there was no method for the constructive work given, but one big method for destruction of the existing guard was indicated.

To the guardsman, particularly to the officer who had labored for recruits, the thing came as a thunderbolt. With all the advantages offered for enlistment in the State militia we could not keep our ranks full. What reason could there possibly be for enlisting in the continental army?

Absolutely none. On the other hand, disadvantages crowded round, the first one being enough to finish the scheme for good. How on earth could the young manhood of our country be persuaded to give up their means of livelihood for two months each summer? The thing was a physical impossibility, so there is no need of wasting words over the other and perfectly obvious disadvantages.

With the death of the continental army proposal the country is confronted with a desperate situation. We must have the men, yet there is no way to provide them. Congress has received many plans to increase the Regular Army through its committees. We can not recruit a large standing army of mercenaries even if we want to. We must make the enlistment contract more attractive or do something else to get it up to at least twice its present size, and probably something of this sort will be done as the result of the Military Committees' bills. But this will still leave us with but a fragment of the forces we require.

All of the schemes remaining can be considered together as a project to federalize and pay, or federalize alone. Federalizing means taking from State control and placing under direct national control. This we want and must have if we are to be efficient. But before going on concerning this point, we must inquire how many more men it will train for our defense.

ATTENDANCE NOT ASSURED.

Federalization alone will give us no increase at all or so small an increase as to be negligible. Opinion is thoroughly divided as to the effect of Federal pay even if Congress would overlook economic objections. Suppose the view of those of us who hold that it would probably give us 250,000 men be taken. As I said previously, this doesn't commence to solve the problem, leaving us, in effect, no better off than before.

So, unless something entirely new is suggested, there is no scheme in sight that will even insure regular attendance at the drills and camps of such forces as we have—no method offered to teach our men how to shoot, to train them to be real soldiers, that can endure the hardships of actual warfare.

But there is a way. It is revolutionary in form. Constructed and backed by proper Federal laws, it should produce the trained citizen soldiers we must have. It involves a scheme of federalization and by implication at least compulsory service; for under it hereafter no physically sound American, upon reaching the age of 21, would be permitted to cast his ballot until he had served a full three-year enlistment in the Federal guard.

Before going a step further—Why not?

Service in the guard can not but be of physical benefit. It is the most democratic thing on earth. There is not a solitary conceivable evil thing that can come to its members in time of peace, and the training had therein means the difference between victory with the minimum loss and rout, slaughter and rapine.

First, we must have a large increase in the number of officers in the Regular Establishment to handle the instruction and administration of this Federal guard. We must have a large increase in the Regular Army to provide enlisted instructors and Regular soldiers for various necessary duties in connection with the supplies and depots of the new force.

WOULD PURCHASE ARMORIES.

The present National Guard of the various States exists by grace of the allotment of Federal funds for pay during camp periods, transportation, expense of the Division of Militia Affairs, instructors, and similar things, and because of the supplies of arms, ammunition, and equipment furnished by the Government.

Withdraw all this ordnance, all these supplies, all Federal funds. Take over the State armories later by purchase. Admit to the Federal guard all organizations of the old guard, subject to proper physical examination and thorough tests of the ability of the officers. Take over officers or men alone where the full units do not care to come. Make use wherever possible of the present adjutants general as department commanders, the officers to rank and be paid as brigadier generals.

Permit in the Federal guard enlistment by sound males up to the age of 45.

Deny to all sound American men from 21 to 25 years of age, inclusive, the right to vote until they have enlisted for the full three-year period. Deny to any who under this prohibition decline to vote in order to escape the Federal guard service the right to vote until he has reached the age of 45 unless he finally undertakes his term with the colors.

This can be done with the greatest ease. Congress and the Executive between them have unlimited powers for raising armies. By employing the draft and basing the draft on registration books or other lists of voters, but on nothing else, a citizen of draft age would be compelled to refrain from voting in order to avoid service in the Federal guard.

While we have no accurate figures on the approximate number of males who reach the age of 21 each year, we have certain significant figures from the Census Bureau. On April 15, 1910, there were in the United States 26,999,151 males 21 years of age or over. On July 1, 1916, there will be 29,947,950. Roughly, an increase of 3,500,000 per year.

Increasing our facilities for training as rapidly as we may after taking over the State armories and equipment formerly allotted the National Guard, we will find that there are more physically sound young men available every year than we can train. Therefore, word the law so that the Government can call to the guard only such ages of young men as experience proves will be needed.

It will be necessary to make the work compulsory once the enlistment period is begun, and laws without loopholes must be provided for this purpose.

Experience may show that our young men would rather give up the ballot than serve. A separate section of the enactment could provide for absolute disenfranchisement of men who reach the age of 35 without voting.

After serving his three years each guardsman should place his uniform, rifle, and complete field kit in his own locker in a depot provided for this purpose. For the next three years he would be subject to call in a national emergency. Under a proper scheme of mobilization once each year (say the Fourth of July) he would be called to the colors for a one-day review.

A large number of officers of the Regular Establishment would be required to command the reserve, and enlisted personnel from the Regular Establishment would care for the depots and provide such necessary noncommissioned officers as needed for first sergeant, quartermaster sergeant, and possibly other positions in the reserves at the times of mobilization.

OFFICERS FROM THE RANKS.

The machinery of the reserve could largely come in through the present State administrative staffs, taken over into the Federal Guard or provided by the Federal Government.

The instruction of the Federal Guard would come at first directly under the supervision of officers of the Regular Army. This work could be rapidly turned over to the officers of the Federal Guard as developed. Competent officers of the existing National Guard would be taken over, where possible, at their present rank, but no new officers above the grade of first lieutenant should be developed from new material during the first three years of enlistment. After the first three years captains would come from the ranks of properly qualified lieutenants who had served at least one full enlistment period, field officers coming naturally from the ranks of the qualified captains. Seniority and qualification must govern the choice of officers, never popularity. Officers of the active list could be transferred to commands in the reserve list, gradually replacing the Regular Army officers at first employed for that purpose.

The burden of drill would be so slight that it is almost inconceivable the plan has not been advanced before. One uniform only—the field—would be provided. Drill would occur 30 or 40 nights a year at weekly intervals and at three previously determined week ends, when, regardless of condition of weather, the men would be taken into the field on Saturday afternoons and returned to their armories at midnight on Sunday nights. This would accustom the men to the mechanics of bivouac and the hikes would go a long way toward keeping them in physical condition. A somewhat similar plan involving only Saturday afternoons or other holidays would give the men their instruction with small arms on the ranges.

Then two weeks' intensive training in the field similar to that dished out at the business men's camps last summer at the vacation period each year and we would have in our reserves not the best-trained troops in the world, but bodies of splendid young Americans ready to fight at the drop of the hat and ready to get to the place of fighting in good condition and take care of their health until the fighting comes.

As soon as our machinery is in working order this scheme should provide 500,000 men a year.

Its success depends fundamentally upon our young men proving loyal to their country—loyal enough to be willing to serve and vote. If bitter experience should prove that our manhood will give up the ballot rather than prepare to defend the country against an invader, then in sorrow and deep humiliation we must consider direct conscription as the only salvation of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 79. That section 1315, Revised Statutes, as amended by section 4 of the act of June 6, 1900, the act of June 28, 1902, the act of March 3, 1903, the act of April 19, 1910, and the act of August 9, 1912, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"The Corps of Cadets shall consist of 2 from each congressional district, 2 from each Territory, 4 from the District of Columbia, 2 from Porto Rico, 4 from each State at large, and 60 from the United States at large. They shall be appointed by the President and shall, with the exception of the 60 appointed from the United States at large, be actual residents of the congressional or Territorial district, or of the District of Columbia, or of the island of Porto Rico, or of the States, respectively, from which they purport to be appointed: Provided, That under such regulations as the President shall prescribe the increase in the number of cadets provided by this act shall be divided into four annual increments, which shall be as nearly equal as practicable and be equitably distributed among the sources from which appointments are authorized.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 87, line 12, after the word "authorized," by inserting a colon and the following words:

"Provided further, That nothing in this act shall operate to prevent the appointment of natives of the Philippine Islands to the West Point Military Academy as is now provided for by law."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I just want to say that that amendment is offered out of an abundance of caution so that these natives in the Philippine Islands will not be excluded from the Military Academy.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 87, line 7, after the word "Provided," by inserting the following:

"That in addition to the said 60 to be appointed from the United States at large the President is hereby authorized to appoint not to exceed 10 cadets annually to the United States Military Academy, each of whom shall have been recommended to the War Department as the honor graduate of an educational institution having an officer of the Army detailed as professor of military science and tactics under existing law and designated in War Department orders as an 'honor school' upon the determination of its relative standing at the last preceding annual inspection regularly made by the War Department: And provided further."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I will accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMYER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 86, line 33, strike out the word "two" and insert in lieu thereof the word "four"; page 86, line 24, strike out the word "two" and insert in lieu thereof the word "four"; page 86, line 25, strike out the word "four" and insert in lieu thereof the word "eight."

Mr. OVERMYER. Mr. Chairman, throughout the discussions of this bill as well as during the general addresses that have been made on the subject of preparedness there has been an almost universal expression from the Members that we ought to have a larger body of trained officers.

I believe that a vast majority of the speakers who have expressed themselves on the military subject have agreed that one of the most important features of increasing the efficiency of our Military Establishment is to provide a larger number of trained officers, and I wish to take this time only for the purpose of calling your attention to a measure that has been introduced, providing for a larger graduation of trained men both from West Point and Annapolis by establishing a united service first-year school somewhere in the Middle West.

The bill H. R. 12766 asks that we add to the present Army 40,000 men and 2,405 commissioned officers. About 2,200 of these will be line officers, and at least 60 per cent should come from the Military Academy. At present I wish to call attention exclusively to this increase of officers and ask what proportion of these officers are to be obtained from our Military Academy? Does the bill provide for an adequate increase of these officers from the Military Academy? From a careful study of the bill I would say that it does not. Ever since the foundation of our Army it has depended for the character, discipline, and thoroughness of its efficiency upon the graduates of West Point, for whether the officer comes from the National Guard, from civil life, or from the ranks, his ultimate worth as an officer comes from the Army through each nongraduate officer following the example, teachings, and traditions put into the Army by West Pointers. These vital principles are always maintained there by these same graduate officers from that school, which has no equal in any country in the world.

Section 79 of this bill provides that the Corps of Cadets at the academy shall consist of 1,134 members. This number is by no means as large as it should be, yet to accommodate this number nearly one-half million of dollars must be expended at the Point to provide for improvised shelter, enlargement of quarters, and so forth, and when all that is done they must put three boys in each room—rooms that were built for two. The meal house must be divided, one half the corps eating at a time. Both of these features are detrimental to the health and comfort of the cadets, for every moment they stay at the Point they are under intensive training. This uncalled for crowding is absolutely unfair to the first-year cadet. He does not have the chance he is entitled to, and it will follow that the failures that annually occur in February will be greater in proportion than they now are. Besides overworking the cadets, every enlisted man, professor, and officer at West Point must work overtime, all this militating against the first-year cadet.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OVERMYER. I thank the gentleman. For this reason, as well as for many others, I urge the separation of the first-year cadets from both our Military and Naval Academies, and urge the establishment of one separate school, apart from the academies, where the first-year cadet shall be prepared to finish the remaining three years of his training at the Military and Naval Academies. The plan I refer to is formulated in House bill 12487, introduced by myself on February 29 last, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. And I might say a similar bill is pending in the Senate, introduced by Senator POMERENE, of Ohio.

The number in the Corps of Cadets, as provided in the bill now before the House, is 1,134. The Superintendent of the Military Academy has stated in his report on this subject that only 18.5 per cent of the Corps of Cadets can expect to graduate. This means, with the present system, that West Point can graduate but 209 officers annually.

Foreseeing the disastrous effects of this crowding, the bill H. R. 12487 asks that the increase of cadets be spread over four years. Under the present plant one-third of the school will always be composed of fourth classmen, or freshmen, a bad condition for a Government military school which depends upon direct individual instruction for success. Four years from now, under the present system, there may be graduating classes of 209 officers. Even in this possibility there is a decided discrepancy, because the academy authorities estimate upon 150 or more vacancies, which would actually reduce the expected number of graduates to 182. If all at the academy in June last, and the proper proportion of this year's entering class should graduate, the academy would produce but 640 officers in four years.

This output is not enough. It represents but 30 per cent of the 2,200 new officers, and takes no account of the yearly waste due to retirements, deaths, and resignations. The graduates should represent not less than 60 per cent of the line of the Army. The conservatism that stands in the way of adopting a plan that will make our two great schools more productive is due to a mere handful of officers. These officers must not be permitted to stand in the way of making the academies double their usefulness.

Admiral Fletcher, commanding our great North Atlantic Fleet, in speaking of the difficulties the plant at Annapolis would have under the present system of turning out the naval officers for the Navy, said before the Committee on Naval Affairs, "It is extraordinary," and so forth. (Fletcher's statements in hearing, Rept. No. 25, p. 2339:)

Admiral FLETCHER. I understand now that you have authorized as many as 1,700 midshipmen at Annapolis. Of course, it is difficult to name that full number there and keep the vacancies filled, but, even if you could do that, it is doubtful if 1,700 will be sufficient to supply future requirements of our ships already built or authorized. I believe that it will be necessary to go up as high as 2,000. There have been several suggestions made as to how this could be accomplished. One has been to increase the accommodations at Annapolis by temporary structures which would afford accommodations quite satisfactory for an emergency. Other suggestions have been made that we build another Naval Academy, but there are serious objections to this, because it gives two different schools. It is very desirable that all officers should have the same instruction and the same training, and if it is desirable to separate the schools at all it would be better to provide some place for educating the fourth class. The young men that just enter could go through a preparatory school, and then go through Annapolis, so in that way they would all have the same training.

This argument applies more strongly to West Point, from which a much greater number of officers is rightly expected by the country. The bill under discussion provides that each congressional district shall have 2 cadets at West Point and 4 from each State at large and 60 appointed by the President. H. R. 12487, which is in the hands of the Committee on Military Affairs, calls for a first-year united-service school and provides that each congressional district shall have 4 cadets at each school, 8 from each State at large, 40 at each school appointed by the President, and 12 at each school appointed by the Vice President.

The Corps of the Military Cadets would then be 2,250 instead of 1,134, and the graduates 407 instead of 209. This, of course, is also theoretical. Practically there would be at West Point at all times its full capacity of 1,200, and 550 at the first-year school. All vacancies would be at the first-year school, and each year there would graduate from West Point 370 officers.

All through the bill now before the House it refers to the Regular Army as a standard of discipline and organization. The high standard and efficient organization of our Army is primarily due to our West Point graduates. Now, if the increase is not provided, with a much greater proportion of West Pointers than is asked for in this bill, this high standard will be lowered. The injection into the Army of civilians, National Guard officers, men from the ranks, and officers from the cadet companies may be necessary; but if the graduates of the same standard as now provided at our Military Academy are not greatly increased, our Army will very soon show a loss in spirit, prestige, and efficiency.

In the Senate there was a somewhat full discussion of this subject yesterday. It was suggested there that we could well afford to educate twice as many men for military service as we have use for in the Regular Army and return some of the graduates to civil life. I personally favor this idea, for the table found in yesterday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD discloses that a much larger per cent of West Point and Annapolis graduates who go into civil life make a success of their chosen professions than do the products of other educational institutions of the country. Besides, by this arrangement we would have at all times a reserve of well-educated and trained officers who could be called again to the service in the hour of danger and need.

I sincerely hope that the committee will consider and report favorably my bill (H. R. 12487), and that this House will provide by its passage a first-year united-service school, as therein provided, so that the congestion at West Point and Annapolis which will follow the passage of H. R. 12766 will be relieved. But what is more important, the establishment of such school will enlarge the graduating classes at both academies, because practically all failures will occur at the first-year school.

Our Military Academy is the pride of the country, and the more boys that enter that school the better it will be for the country. It means much to each congressional district that every year a boy goes to the academy, and not every two years, as provided in this bill, and the interest is kept constantly alive. The Military Academy has cost vast sums of money, and it has been well spent. Let us spend more money. Let the school be expanded by means of the first-year service school. Four hundred graduates means that but four young men to each million of our people receive this diploma of inestimable value. Every dollar spent on a diploma is returned a thousandfold through maintaining the efficiency and solid worth of that important arm of defense, the Regular Army of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I was elected on a platform pledging myself to support any measure that would double or treble the military and naval schools of our country.

In discussing the question of preparedness I use the county in which I live as an incident that I think will be found concurrent generally throughout the agricultural country, especially in time of danger. I am sure there are from two to three thousand men in Hopkins County, Tex., who would readily and cheerfully respond to the colors in time of the country's need. I am also quite sure that we would not be able to find exceeding 20 men of that number who would be able to take charge of mustering, controlling, and properly directing a company or a regiment unless we got some old "graycoat" or "bluecoat" who is now worn out. Now, that is a misfortune. That is unpreparedness that is calamitous in its effect when we want to call into ready action the great militant force of Americanism; and I am supporting this amendment. I am supporting the Army bill, and I want to join the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] in stating that I concur in all his compliments to this committee. In the frenzy and agitation, in the overwhelming, aggravating condition of the world, I feel gloriously proud of the record this Congress is making in the presentation and the practical unanimity with which we are supporting this measure. I hope this amendment will be adopted, because it enlarges an element necessary to officer the ranks that may be called out at any time in the course of a night. Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand the bill just passed by the Senate providing for what this section provides. Now, the Committee on Military Affairs can report this bill to the House and have it passed long before we can hope that the bill under consideration will be passed and agreed to by the two Houses, and I therefore move to strike out the section with a view of reporting the Senate bill within a few days.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia to strike out section 79.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to address myself in favor of the motion if it is debatable. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to discuss the motion itself, but I have arisen at this time to call attention to an editorial which appeared in last week's issue of the Scientific American which I think reflects very seriously upon the integrity if not the honor of the Members of this House in the method of selecting appointees at Annapolis and West Point. The article is headed, "Merit in place of politics," and is as follows:

MERIT IN PLACE OF POLITICS.

Absolutely the most important institution embraced under the comprehensive term "naval defenses" is the Naval Academy at Annapolis. To this institution are sent the young men of America who (presumably because of their inherent fitness for the task) have been selected to control the country's outermost defenses, its far-flung line of battle on the high seas. So enormous is the responsibility which rests upon the shoulders of a naval officer that the average American citizen would naturally suppose that each contingent of young men, as it is selected year by year and sent to Annapolis, is chosen solely on the ground of its physical, mental, and moral fitness for the arduous duties and high national responsibilities of a naval officer. This would imply, of course, selection by a system of searching competitive examination.

As a matter of fact, with a few exceptions, no such system of selection exists. On the contrary, the success of the candidates is dependent in the majority of cases upon the political exigencies with which our Senators and Representatives find themselves confronted when they make their annual selection of young men for Annapolis and West Point; for it is a lamentable fact that, more often than not, the selection of the candidates for the enormously important duties of the naval and military officer is entirely in the hands of the professional politician.

Nor does the influence of politics end with the appointment of the cadet, nor even with his failure. "The powerful political hand," says the conference committee on national preparedness, "that puts a young man into either Academy (Annapolis or West Point) may often be raised to keep him there after he has been tried and found wanting. At times a 25-cent telegram may set all the machinery of a vast political organization into motion to save a failure from dismissal."

Now, such conditions are nothing less than scandalous. The Congressman who recommends a young man to the Academy on any other grounds than his fitness therefor is guilty of an act that is highly unpatriotic. We will go further and say that the Congressman who will set in motion political enginery to save a discredited youth from dismissal is guilty of that which, in the spirit if not in the letter, is perilously near to high treason.

Some of our Congressmen, it is true, are fully alive to the need for competitive examinations, and the young men of their districts enter Annapolis and West Point only through that straight and narrow door; but the practice should be made obligatory and universal. In his annual report for 1913 Col. C. P. Townsley, of West Point, says: "These cadetships belong to the people of the District, State, Territory, etc., and should be open competitively to all the youths, eligible to compete, and it is my recommendation that a law be enacted requiring competitive examinations to be held for each vacancy, that youth to be appointed who passes successfully the best mental examination, and who is physically and morally qualified. The examination questions should be prepared by the academic board, and a successful passing of the competitive examination should qualify a youth to enter, so that no other mental examination need be required. The details of conducting such examinations should, I think, be left to the Secretary of War. By announcing in the local papers some 10 months or a year in advance that such a competitive examination will be held, stating its scope, it is believed that there will be a large number of eligible youths who will present themselves for examination in each district from which a vacancy is to be filled."

We commend this matter, as being one of the most vital affecting national preparedness, to the thoughtful consideration of every congressional district throughout the country. At once and absolutely the matter of the selection of young men for the high duties of the naval and military officer should be lifted out of the dubious field of politics.

My reason for taking up the time of the committee at this time is for the purpose of denying the allegation made by this editorial, because I believe I state the truth when I say that not one Member out of one hundred of this House, and an equally small proportion of the Senate, ever makes an appointment of an applicant for West Point or Annapolis from a political or partisan standpoint. [Applause.] Since I have read this editorial my attention was called to an incident that occurred recently in connection with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], which I, with his permission, will recite.

Not long ago a young man came to Washington and appeared before the gentleman from Illinois as an applicant for an appointment to Annapolis. He said that he had taken the examination a year ago and failed, but that in the meantime he had prepared himself more thoroughly and believed that he was qualified to stand the examination and be admitted. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], according to the story which was told to me, said to him, "All right. I have a vacancy and I will be glad to give you a chance to stand this examination." But the young man said, "I want to say to you before you recommend me that I was recommended last year by Mr. O'Hair," to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] very properly replied, "What difference does that make?" and immediately gave this young man the appointment to Annapolis which had been offered and given to him the year before by his Democratic opponent and predecessor in the House, Mr. O'Hair, of Illinois. [Applause.]

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I desire to state to the gentleman that I have competitive examinations held in my district, with examiners selected from the principals of the high schools in my district, and who, perhaps, have more to do with selecting those who go to the academy than I do. I say that in line with the gentleman's statement.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am glad to know that.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I shall not object, but can we not close the debate on the section?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the reference that my colleague has made to the article which he has just read, I wish to say that the man from whom it emanated did not know what he was talking about.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Is it not true that they keep records at the academy of whether or not the young men who enter are appointed by competitive examination? I think they do.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think they do.

Mr. GARDNER. And I think it would be a good idea if the gentleman would put in a resolution asking the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to make a report on that, because my impression is that a very large number of cadets are appointed after competitive examinations.

Mr. BARKLEY. I realize that, but there may be some instances in which it is not practical to have a competitive examination; for instance, where there are not enough applicants to justify it.

Mr. GARDNER. I agree with that.

Mr. BARKLEY. This editorial further goes on to state——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I wanted to ask whether the gentleman knows whether or not the Civil Service Commission will now prepare papers for any Member of Congress who desires to have a competitive examination held?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is my understanding.

That editorial further goes on in its reflection upon the Members of this House, stating that a 25-cent telegram can put in operation certain political machinery to undo the recommendation of the War Department and give an opportunity to keep a discredited appointee at West Point or at Annapolis. That statement is wholly unjustified by the facts. I made an appointment to West Point a year ago of a bright, young, stalwart American boy, nearly 6 feet tall, and as clean as a hound's tooth, morally. He would have made as good a soldier as ever looked down the barrel of a rifle, but he failed in one or two studies at the midterm examination, and for that reason he was dropped by the academic board. This young man asked me to go to the War Department, which I did, to see if the department would permit him to have another chance to make up his deficiency, so that he might be permitted to continue his studies at West Point and go into the Army; and yet, according to the estimation of the editor of the Scientific American, I was guilty of high treason in undertaking to get this American boy another chance to stay at West Point and demonstrate his ability to make good. I did not succeed in getting him to remain there, and the consequence is that there is still a vacancy in the academy from my district, which I am attempting to fill by an examination to be held in the near future.

In reply to the statement that Members make recommendations to Annapolis and West Point for political reasons, I desire to say that out of two whom I have recommended for appointment to Annapolis and at the academy one of them is a Republican and one of the boys whom I have recommended as an alternate at West Point at the coming examination is a Republican, or, at least, the son of a Republican, and I think the same thing may be said as to the policy of other Members of Congress. We never ask the politics of boys who apply for these appointments. And I wanted to take advantage of this section of the bill at this time to call attention to the fact that the editor of the Scientific American, or any other journal, who may inclose himself in a Chinese wall, impervious alike to the reception or dissemination of information, is taking upon himself a serious burden to undertake to indict the entire House of Representatives because of the fact that some Member may now and then undertake to keep his vacancies filled either at Annapolis or at West Point. Every Member knows they are hard enough to keep filled at best, and every Member knows that there is no politics in the appointments to the Military or Naval Academies, and ought not to be.

We have had a great deal of talk in the House about the rigidity of the examination. I think it is rigid. I think the examinations are not sufficiently flexible, and I would be glad if it were possible for competitive examinations to be held in every district so as to select the most satisfactory—physically, morally, and intellectually—appointees for these places which are to produce the officers of the Army and Navy later on. But it is not always practical to do that, and it is not true that because Members of Congress are given the privilege of making these recommendations they do it for political or partisan reasons or that they are guilty of treason or of an unpatriotic performance of duty if they ask the War Department or the Navy Department to reconsider the dismissal of an appointee to West Point or Annapolis and afford an opportunity for many a deserving boy to show the mettle of which he is made.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate is closed. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OVERMYER].

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia moves to strike out the section. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 80. That such arms, tentage, and equipment as the Secretary of War shall deem necessary for proper military training shall be supplied by the Government to schools and colleges having a course of military training prescribed by the Secretary of War and having not less than 100 physically fit male students above the age of 14 years, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to detail such commissioned and noncommissioned officers of the Army to said schools and colleges, detailing not less than 1 such officer or noncommissioned officer to each 400 students under military instruction.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. KAHN. I simply desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to the fact that we are taking away from the Regular Army, by this section and other sections of the bill, a large number of noncommissioned officers that will leave vacancies in the enlisted force of the Army. It seems to me that it is exceedingly desirable that there should be a provision in the bill for an additional force of noncommissioned officers to supply those who are detailed under this and other sections.

Mr. HAY. I think the gentleman is correct about that, and we will arrange to have the noncommissioned officers supplied. I do not know how many it will take, and I would like to get a statement from the War Department as to how many. In conference we can arrange that.

Mr. KAHN. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 87, line 17, strike out the words "one hundred" and insert in lieu thereof "fifty."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HAY. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman will not press that amendment. We think we are making a very liberal provision now, and to provide that there should be an Army officer for every 50 students would be straining the point, I think, a little too far.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, while I take it that in no event will there be an Army officer detailed to every school, nor will there in any event be a cadet corps organized in every school eligible under this paragraph, yet it will be the policy of the War Department—and it ought to be the policy of the War Department—to encourage military training in the schools of the country, wherever that is possible; and if that is the policy, the least the Government can do is to furnish the necessary arms, equipment, tentage, and instruction.

Now, the section, as it is written, limits the aid to be given by the Government to such schools as have 100 physically fit male students over 14 years of age.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman think it would be competent under the terms of this provision for boys around the school who are not regularly taking the school course to attach themselves to the school for the purpose of getting the military training only, and making up the quota for that purpose?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think not.

Mr. ADAMSON. That ought to be done.

Mr. ANDERSON. Under the regulations of the War Department I think that would be entirely impossible.

As I was stating, Mr. Chairman, the section under consideration limits the aid given by the Government to such schools as have 100 male pupils. Now, there are 1,097 such high schools, in addition to colleges and universities. Not all of them will organize cadet companies. These 1,097 schools are about 10 per cent of the total public high schools and have less than half of the high-school students in the country.

The effect of the paragraph, therefore, if my amendment is not adopted, would be to eliminate 90 per cent of the high schools and 60 per cent of the students in the high schools from any opportunity to receive military instruction, even if such schools were willing to organize cadet companies and maintain them in accordance with the regulations laid down by the War Department. There are only six States in which the average male attendance over 14 years of age is in excess of 100. In all the rest of them the average is less than 100. In the State represented in part by my distinguished friend from Virginia [Mr. HAY] the average male attendance in the high schools is only 26. The amendment which I propose, inserting 50 instead of 100, will reach by no means the majority of the schools, but it will extend the aid of the Government only to such schools as have a sufficient number to organize a reasonable sized cadet company.

Now, 50 men is 6 squads. That is a pretty good cadet company, and it seems to me that any school that will organize a cadet company of 50 men ought to be entitled to the little aid that this section gives, merely the furnishing of tentage, arms, and equipment. That is little enough for the Government to do for any school which will organize and maintain a cadet company in accordance with the regulations laid down by the War Department.

The section as it now stands is a discrimination—a discrimination which can not possibly be based upon any accurate knowledge as to the number of schools in the country or the conditions under which they are working, and I submit, as a matter of fairness, as a matter of fairness to the high schools, many of which can not come under this provision at all, that the amendment which I suggest ought to be adopted. If it is not adopted, the aid given under this section will be limited practically to six States on the eastern seaboard.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, the section under consideration was never intended to apply to high schools. It is impossible to provide a military officer to train pupils in every high school in this country. If you will read the bill, you will see that it provides for schools and colleges having a course of military training prescribed by the Secretary of War. Now, it is impossible for us to impose upon the high schools of the different States any course of military training. We have the land-grant colleges, and colleges like the Virginia Military Institute and the Vermont University, and other military schools throughout the country. That is what we were trying to provide for. We fixed the number at 400 upon the evidence of one of the most successful educators in this country, Dr. James, of the University of Illinois, who stated that he thought if we had one military officer for every 400 students in these colleges, that would be enough. Now, under the present law you can only detail one officer to each of these schools and colleges. For example, the University of Illinois has 2,000 men in its cadet corps, and that university has only one Regular Army officer. Under the provisions of this section they would have five. So we are providing as liberally as possible. It is impossible to provide for all of the high schools.

Mr. KREIDER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. KREIDER. I would like to know whether this section or any other section of this bill would include the Carlisle Indian School?

Mr. HAY. I really have not given it any thought. I do not know.

Mr. KREIDER. I want to say to the gentleman that the superintendent of that school has for some time tried to get from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs the necessary equipage so that he might be enabled to train the Indian boys in that school. They have at that school a bandmaster, a man who served for many years in the Regular Army and who has a thorough military training and who is anxious to give the school this military training, and all that he asks is the equipment.

Mr. HAY. I think that if the Secretary of War chose to do it, he could.

Mr. KREIDER. Under the provisions of this law?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I believe he already has the authority under the present law.

Mr. HAY. This section provided for furnishing them with the arms, tentage, and equipments at schools where they have a course of military training prescribed by the Secretary of War and where they have not less than 100 students.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It is the last part of the section which provides the authority for detailing commissioned and noncommissioned Army officers.

Mr. HAY. One for each 400 students.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is it the purpose of this bill to permit the loaning to colleges and schools having 100 students, carrying on a course of military instruction, this tentage and equipments, and confining the detail of officers only to those schools having as many as 400 students?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. KREIDER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Carlisle school would be included in this?

Mr. HAY. I think it is, if the Secretary of War chooses to prescribe it.

Mr. KREIDER. Does the gentleman from Virginia concur in the opinion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] that the present law would permit him to do it?

Mr. HAY. I have not examined it, but I think it would.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There are about 1,000 students in the school, and more than half of them are young men over 18 years of age. Consequently they would come under the provisions of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Under the provisions of this section I see that a Regular Army officer or a noncommissioned officer is to be detailed by the Secretary of War to any school that gives military instruction, and, of course, that officer is supposed to be at that school constantly, training the boys. Now, there are many schools in the United States that have cadet organizations. Those organizations are being inspected periodically by military officers. Upon the request of the principal of one of these schools, he can have an officer sent from the nearest military post for the purpose of inspecting the drill and the maneuvers of the cadets. But that officer is not taken away from the Army for a long period or for the time that he is detailed. He simply goes for two or three hours at a time, and then goes back again to his organization. Any military organization in our schools in this country can get that kind of a detail, and that is all that is required. But to detail a man to every school that has 50 students would simply require an enormous force of noncommissioned officers. For that reason I think the amendment is impracticable. I think the purpose of the gentleman can be accomplished by having the principals of the schools make a request upon the Army officer nearest to the school for a man to come occasionally and inspect the student body in their drills.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I do not know exactly what the law is to-day, because I have not looked it up recently, but I do know that four years ago there existed no authority for the Secretary of War to loan equipage and matériel of this kind to schools.

Mr. KAHN. Or to anybody else.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Or to anybody else. I know that I tried to secure favorable consideration by the Military Affairs Committee of a bill which gave that authority to the Secretary of War, but it was not the judgment of the committee that it should be passed at that time.

I am heartily in favor of this paragraph, because it gives that authority. I want to say one word further. I sincerely believe that this is but a step in the long road that we ought to travel. [Applause.] The provisions of this bill will help create a military establishment, but they are only a starter. You will never have an adequate Military Establishment in the United States until all the youth of the United States in the public schools are trained to military discipline.

Now, there is logic and reason for training the boys in the public schools in at least the rudiments of military discipline. There is but one reason why we can tax our people to support the public schools, and that is because the existence, the perpetuity, as well as the well-being of the State, requires an intelligent citizenship, and when you have an intelligent citizenship you probably will have a good country and a good nation. There is one thing more that is needed. It is one thing to have a good country, it is another to have one that will stand the test of attack.

I take it, for one, that it should be the duty of the youth of the country not only to acquire an intellectual and moral equipment to fit them for good citizenship, but to acquire military capacity that will enable them to make the country valuable in its duties and relations with the world.

It was my first impression in reading the paragraph that it would give to the public schools of the country some slight chance to undertake this duty, to my mind the most important part of the work. The language that I thought gave the authority is found where it says "the course of military training to be prescribed by the Secretary of War." This does not say what that course shall be. It might be a reasonable number of hours of drill each week under competent authority. I think the language gives the Secretary of War ample authority to establish military training in every high school of the land that has 100 male students over 14 years of age. For that reason I am especially in favor of it.

Now, I appreciate that which my colleague [Mr. ANDERSON] desires to accomplish—that if the Secretary of War, next year or two years from now, may find some reason for extending the benefits of this act to the public-school system, that the benefits may go to smaller schools—and yet I can not agree with him that it would be advisable to take that course. Fifty male students at a high school will not make a very strong organization—only half a company. I can conceive that it might be possible that in a county like that in which the gentleman lives—and I know something about it, because I lived there, teaching school four years—it might be possible in a county like that to have one organization among the five high schools of the county.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. We want to try and get through this bill to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia moves that all debate on the section and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, this provision authorizes any school having 100 boys to have the benefits of this section, and is similar to the one for the land-grant colleges, which provides, I believe, for 115 boys over 15 years of age, and the teacher, in addition, becomes the instructor in mathematics. Everyone knows that a teacher in mathematics who is a graduate from West Point is in the highest class as a mathematical teacher.

Some days ago the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] called attention to the fact that there were 2,159,000 of the volunteers in the Civil War under 21 years of age. This is about the proportion of those who volunteer in every war, of those unmarried compared with those married, so that the young men constitute the armies of the country.

Now, military science teaches us that we ought to have the reserve. That seems to be agreed upon as a sound policy by all of us. We disagree as to how to get that reserve. Some say get it by one year's service under the colors and then retire to the reserve, but, in view of the fact that men will not enlist and in view of the further fact that the American people will not stand for compulsory service of any kind, it occurs to me that that fact, connected with the further fact that the young men of the country make up the armies in the time of war, that our reserve ought to consist of all the able-bodied male inhabitants of the Republic. Of course, it would require a generation to do that by training them in all the schools of the country. Of course, this is but a beginning, but it will grow as time grows.

A knowledge of military hygiene, military discipline, as well as military tactics, is important to the citizen, even though he never engages in war. We all know that the German can restrain his passions and his appetite better than any other man, and, in my opinion, it is largely due to the fact of military training. The German military training without her compulsory service is desirable. The average American would want a keg of beer, while an ordinary German could have half a day's fun on one little bottle. Such is he the master of his appetite and his passions. No; I do not say that because I have a German constituency, but that is the fact, as everybody knows. If there is one thing an American boy ought to know, it is to throw a brake on his appetites and passions.

Quintilian, the old Roman rhetorician, once said that no man could become a great orator unless he was at the same time a trained soldier and a trained dancer, basing that on the belief that mannerism and poise had much to do with the attractiveness of the speaker. I am of the opinion also that this discipline which the boy will get from military training will increase his earning capacity and his economic value to society. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Virginia, a question. The Senate has passed S. 4726, which I called to the attention of the chairman last week. I want to know whether this section could not be treated in the same way as we treated the cadet bill, have it stricken out, and taken up when the cadet bill is reported back. This section under consideration is in substantially the same language as the Senate bill, except the necessary qualifications of the school. In the bill under consideration it is required that the schools shall have over 100 male students before it can claim benefits under this law. The language of the Senate bill is as follows:

By the students of any educational institution to which an officer of the Army is detailed as professor of military science and tactics.

The Senate bill was introduced by my distinguished colleague, Senator NELSON, at the suggestion of the University of Minnesota.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman that this is a much broader provision than the Senate bill. It does more than is done by the Senate bill, and I think if he is interested in having something done for these schools, he would better permit this to stay in the bill, because we do not know when we will get that Senate bill up. In any event, it would go upon the Unanimous Consent Calendar and some one might object, and if we let this stay in the bill now it is sure to become a law.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, with the gentleman's suggestion that he feels that this is broader than the Senate bill, and since I am in sympathy with the section, I feel satisfied.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 81. That authority is hereby given to the Secretary of War to grant permission by revocable license to the American National Red Cross to erect and maintain on any military reservations within the jurisdiction of the United States buildings suitable for the storage of supplies, or to occupy for that purpose buildings erected by the United States, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, such supplies to be available for the aid of the civilian population in case of serious national disaster.

Mr. STEPHENS of California. Mr. Chairman, my amendment to strike out the last word was not made in opposition to the section for I strongly favor it. My formal amendment was made that I might address the House on that which is uppermost to-day in the minds of all patriotic men and women.

Mr. Chairman, there is no question more important to the life and welfare of this Republic than that of preparedness for national defense. I have been deeply interested in it for many years, and since I became a Member of this body, five years ago, have worked and talked for it, in committees, on this floor, and at home. In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 29, 1915, can be found some of my thoughts on preparedness and adequate defense. From my words at that time, I quote the following:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am not for war. I am for peace, everlasting peace. I am for a larger Navy and a larger Army, because I believe that is one of the ways to keep this country at peace. I am not a jingoist in any sense of the word. I am as far from that as any man can possibly be, but I do believe that now is the time to take out more insurance against war. * * *

I am not and do not pretend to be a naval or an Army expert, but a business man, with what I think is ordinary business sense, and it is because I believe it is a good business proposition, as well as one that will preserve the young men of this Nation, and perhaps save our women from the awful heartbreakings and sufferings and aftermath of war, that I advocate a larger Navy and a larger Army at this time. * * *

I would insure this Nation against war, for I want no more war-bereaved mothers, widows, and children, and no more war-maimed and suffering men in these United States. * * *

There never was a war without loses of life, and I think that previous preparation—preparation for defense—not only postpones and may prevent war, but will well serve our Nation in time of war. * * *

Every careful man of family insures his life and often strains to the utmost to meet insurance premiums in order to save his wife and children from a fight for existence after he is gone. Every mother with children is saving something for the rainy days that may come by and by. * * *

Why should we not, as a Nation, insure ourselves against war by preparing our Navy to meet those who may attack us, and our Army and our fortifications to repel all who may invade? Is it wrong for husband and father to carry insurance? Indeed, is it not desirable and advisable to burden ourselves to-day that wives and children may not go hungry to-morrow?

God knows I never want another war, either at home or abroad. I pray for peace. "Peace on earth, good will toward men," means as much to me as to any other man who was taught at his mother's knee to pray for peace everlasting. If the rest of the world is armed, if every other nation in our class is possessed of a navy and an army that she thinks superior to ours, are we not more likely to be nationally imposed upon than if we are unquestionably the stronger? * * *

Shall we as a Nation spend millions of dollars as a warning to the world and a defense against all comers, or shall we wait until the attack is made and then sacrifice our bravest and best, our own and our mothers' sons, in awful war? Shall we delay and pay for our tardiness in the suffering and privation of our soldiers and sailors? Shall we wait until the storm breaks, and then have our women and children miserable and hungry because we would not see? Shall we spend money now or men and money hereafter? Shall we pay out millions of money to avoid war or shall we wait and spend the life blood of hundreds of thousands of our sons and billions of our money in war?

Mr. Chairman, few people realize the diminutive size of the United States Army and a less number realize that in continental United States we have only one fighting soldier for every 60 square miles of territory.

There are only as many regular soldiers prepared to fight for the protection of 100,000,000 of people as there are voters in the cities of Louisville, Ky., or Indianapolis, Ind. All in all, fighting men and otherwise, the United States has only 50,000 regular soldiers in continental United States between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans and between our northern and southern border lines—only so many soldiers as there are men, women, and children in Mobile, Ala., in Charleston, S. C., in Portland, Me., or in Canton, Ohio. Oh, how little insurance we have against trouble from without!

Mr. Chairman, I favor a council of national defense, and am ready now to vote for one. Personally, and as the Representative in this body of an intensely patriotic constituency, I am prepared and anxious to join with a majority in this House in authorizing a council of national defense composed of experts in military and naval affairs; in agriculture; in chemistry; in labor; in manufacturing; in railway, automobile, and highway transportation; in finance; and in legislation.

And I am quite ready now to join with a majority in the promise to vote for the recommendations of that council for abandoning what is useless and creating what is needed for defense, regardless of party or what may be taken from or added to the district I represent. I am not one-hundredth part as interested in local expenditures as I am in the Nation's defense. I shall fight for my own people, but neither pork nor pie shall ever swerve me from what I believe to be for my country's good. Congress should appropriate the money and then authorize the council of national defense to build and provide what we need where we need it.

Mr. Chairman, I favor a larger Army and a greatly increased Navy, for if trouble came from across the borders or beyond the seas we have too small an Army with which to defend ourselves, and at best a Navy able to defend but one coast.

The smallness of our Army has been clearly demonstrated within the last few days. We could not send even a punitive expedition after Villa and his murderers without first having Congress pass a law permitting the enlistment of 20,000 additional soldiers. The men and officers in the Army and Navy of the United States are as brave and capable as any that ever fought on land or sea since time began, but the bravest and the best can not do utterly impossible things. Mr. Chairman, it is wrong in the sight of God and unworthy of this great Nation to send our sons in Army and Navy against an overwhelming enemy. We should adequately reenforce them with men and ships and guns and supplies.

Mr. Chairman, I am concerned for the young men of this Nation, and for the women and children who will have to suffer in proportion to our neglect of manifest duty. It is easy for men to go to battle, and to die, too, for their country in time of war. The march to the music of the fife and drum, the beauty of the flag in front, and the bravery of men all round about, make the wounds of battle, though they be mortal, easy to bear as compared with heartbreakings and the utter loneliness of mothers and wives and the want and deprivation of the children, who, bereft of sons, husbands, and fathers, must live on and suffer on. Oh, men of Congress, and men and women all over this land of peace and plenty, now, now, is the time for the United States to insure its women and children against such bereavement and such distress and misery.

Mr. Chairman, I wish provision for needed brigade mobile army posts and men to man them could be added to this bill. They will be sorely needed if ever we are attacked from without. From them regiments and brigades could be dispatched at an hours' notice to repel an invader.

I am hopeful, too, that this House in its defense legislation will include the building of a national-defense highway, such as I have proposed in H. R. 3667. Construction and maintenance of such a highway should commence and continue under the supreme authority of the President by United States Army Engineer officers. The building of such a defense project will provide—

A national highway circling the United States within its borders and running strategically near the Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf coasts, as well as our northern and southern boundary lines.

A national highway, to be used in times of peace by automobiles, auto trucks, and other vehicles for commercial and healthful purposes.

A national highway extraordinarily useful when war threatens or we are attacked. Over it men in greatest numbers and munitions and supplies can be transported quickly to any point north, south, east, or west.

A national highway 10,000 miles long that will give work at good wages for many years to at least 100,000 American citizens in good times and to several times that number in "hard times." The employment of new men periodically will add greatly to our trained reserves.

A national highway providing physical and mental drill for all manual and clerical employees, thus fitting hundreds of thousands of young men for national defense and to be better heads of families.

I favor a larger Army, as I have said, and a greatly increased Navy. Of the latter I shall address this House when the naval appropriation bill is presented by the committee, of which I am a member. I favor the early mobilization of all necessary information from transportation, manufacturing, agricultural, and labor interests, and I would have all of them fully instructed as to their duties in time of war.

Mr. Chairman, the time to begin to prepare for peace and preservation is now. I am ready to assume my share of the responsibility for ample and adequate defense, both on land and sea. I believe adequate defense is likely to keep the United States out of war; but if in spite of our defense we are attacked, then previous preparation will save the lives of thousands and thousands of our boys and preserve our flag, to float forever above patriotic America. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, a number of years ago, under the inspiration and leadership of Lieut. Edgar Z. Steever, an officer of the Regular Army who had been detailed to duty as inspector instructor of the Organized Militia of Wyoming, there was inaugurated and developed in the city of Cheyenne, the capital of our State, a system of physical and military instruction and training of high-school students which has come to be known as the Wyoming plan or system of cadet instruction. This plan or system of training produced such highly beneficial results and became so popular that it has been adopted by practically all of the high and some of the grammar schools of our State, and the plan is being widely studied and adopted. I have had quite a number of inquiries from Members of Congress and letters from various parts of the country with regard to this plan of instruction and training. In the Everybody's Magazine for February there appeared an article by George Creel, setting forth in a graphic and interesting way the character and results of the Wyoming plan, and I ask unanimous consent that I may insert that article in the RECORD as a part of my remarks. Our people believe that this system of training, if generally adopted, will be of great and lasting benefit to the youth of the country and will do much to prepare our young men for the duties of war or peace. We are proud of the fact that our State has made this important contribution to the cause of true national preparedness, and that our young people, both girls and boys, have displayed such enthusiasm and aptitude for this fine, wholesome type of training. We are also under great obligation to Lieut. Steever for his splendid work.

The article referred to is as follows:

WYOMING'S ANSWER TO MILITARISM—FIVE YEARS OF TRAINING SCHOOLBOYS TO THINK TRUE, LIVE TRUE, AND SHOOT TRUE.

[By George Creel.]

(This is from the Wyoming State superintendent of public instruction.)

May I take this opportunity to express my hearty indorsement of the cadet work which is being done in Wyoming? For some time I have been watching the influence which it has exerted upon the young men enrolled in the various corps, and I wish to say that I consider it most valuable training for our high-school boys. I am glad to see the movement grow in popularity.

EDITH K. O. CLARK.

On May 8, 1915, while a stunned Nation read the death roll of the Lusitania, the high-school boys of Wyoming were gathered in Cheyenne for a "cadet tournament" to determine their progress in physical development and military instruction. Small connection between the two events at first sight, yet the experiment of this Western State in the training of citizen soldiers may be the answer to a vital aspect of the demand for "preparedness" that is the direct result of the liner's destruction.

Some answer must be given. When all is said and done, the ultimate blasphemy is the defiance of facts. For the world to read, Europe has written the grim truth that not treaties nor love of peace nor excessive armaments can guard against the lightning bolt of war. The task of wise patriotism in the United States to-day is to decide upon a rational plan of preparedness that will serve either to deter invasion or to resist it successfully.

Fortunately choice does not lie between an ostrich-headed pacifism and a thick-headed militarism, discredited alike by history and the harsh realities of the day. There is a firm middle ground upon which all may stand who have their hearts set on peace without being blind to the necessity of defense. A citizen soldiery, already insisted upon by Everybody's, is the one plan that meets the needs of sane preparedness without the slightest sacrifice of democratic principles or menace to free institutions.

Nor is it necessary to turn eyes to Switzerland and Australia. For five years Wyoming has been pioneering in this delicate matter of military instruction in the schools, and now places results on the table for all the Nation to see and study. The Swiss and Australian models have been followed in some degree, but the big outstanding features of the plan are entirely original, having particular regard for American ideals and prejudices.

Boston has had high-school cadets for 50 years and Washington, D. C., for 32 years, but the Wyoming experiment lends itself best to investigation because it has had the acid test of opposition.

Service in the cadet corps of Wyoming is not compulsory and there is no such thing as active recruiting, yet 90 per cent of the high-school population of the State has volunteered.

Like most big ideas, the Wyoming experiment "just happened." In 1911 the War Office assigned Lieut. Edgar Z. Steever to duty as inspector-instructor of the Organized Militia of Wyoming, for the Nation still clings to its traditional belief that the National Guard has no need that can not be met by casual contact with an officer of the Regular Army. Quite inevitably Lieut. Steever found time hanging heavily on his hands, and it was out of his restless energy that he conceived the idea of a cadet corps in the high school of Cheyenne. The opposition that sprung instantly into angry life merits analysis because, in its essence, it typifies all opposition to any such ideas.

The labor unions refused to see anything in the plan but a training school for the militia, and they reaffirmed their unalterable hostility to the National Guard as being nothing more than an armed force for the use of the employing class in industrial disputes.

Parents based their objections upon the ground that military instruction would exalt martial ideals in the mind of every youngster. Preachers opposed because they scented militarism, and educators were antagonistic out of their fear that individual initiative would be destroyed and personal responsibility undermined.

Lieut. Steever might have followed the custom of his profession by denouncing those who opposed him as "traitors" and "mollycoddles," but instead of that he analyzed the objections and devised ways of satisfying them in all fairness. It was at this point that the plan left beaten paths and commenced to take on originality.

To the labor unions he said: "I will agree to surrender all idea of compulsion. Enlistment shall be voluntary. I promise complete separation of the cadet corps from the militia and the placing of entire emphasis upon national defense without reference to police duty for the State."

He went to the parents with these assurances: "We will make citizens, not soldiers. Your boys will be taught the advantages of a strong body and a clean mind, the value of self-control and decent restraints, civic duties and responsibilities. Our goal will be the full development of the fraternal instinct—the community-of-interest spirit—so that every youngster will grow up in the understanding that no group, whether it be a cadet company, city, State, or Nation, is stronger than its weakest member."

The clergy and the pacifists were appeased by this frank statement of position: "The essence of militarism is excessive armaments and a huge standing Army, while our purpose is no more than such training of youth during the school years as will permit them to devote their manhood to orderly civil pursuits. You can't cut militarism out with a moral precept. You've got to crowd it out with something better and finer."

The attack of the educators on the score of destroyed initiative was met by a counterattack. "Do you mean to say that the athletic sports of your schools develop initiative?" Lieut. Steever demanded. "Go and listen a while to the coaches of football teams and baseball nines. You rake the school or college for the strongest and most skillful and put these chosen few in the hands of specialists who demand the blindest sort of obedience. This one-half of 1 per cent is the athletic expression of the student body. The 99½ per cent get exercise by sitting in grandstand seats and develop initiative by parroting the cries that a yell leader teaches them. What is this but a tragedy of lopsided development? All thought for those who are strong already and neglect for those who can not make a team. My cadet plan reaches every boy in the school with a training that will strengthen him physically, mentally, and morally."

The Cheyenne school board gave its consent at last, and Lieut Steever issued his call for volunteers. Just 16 boys responded, their ages running from 12 to 18, and with ever greater differences in the matter of physique. First of all Lieut. Steever had them elect two leaders, and when this was done two squads were formed of eight men each, the leaders taking turn about in choosing members. As a consequence each squad contained an equal number of strong, medium, and weak.

His squads formed, Lieut. Steever straightway made appeal to the three fundamentals of juvenile life—the love of games, the competitive instinct, and the "gang" instinct. "It's one squad against the other," he said. "Nip and tuck. We're going to have a tournament in January, and the winners will get gold medals. Remember now, team play does it. Your squad's your gang, boys."

The setting-up exercises and calisthenics came under routine, but Lieut. Steever got the game note with competitive wall scaling. Enlisting the services of a carpenter, he had two board walls, about 8 feet 4 inches in height, chocked in place in the gymnasium. A 15-foot run started the climb, and the race was to see which squad could scramble over first.

Won gradually by the splendid time that the cadets seemed to be having, other boys dropped into line, so that by the day of the tournament 55 youngsters were working away and having the sport of their lives. No less a personage than the governor of the State opened the tournament with a stirring address, the big gymnasium was packed with fathers and mothers and friends, the national colors were presented to the cadet corps, and then the squads took the floor and commenced the struggle for medals. No football game or baseball clash ever aroused the enthusiasm that shook the building as those youngsters whirled through the drill or tore over the high wall, and when the bugle shrilled its last note the last objection to a cadet corps died with it.

Every boy in the Cheyenne High School was now enrolled—that is, every fit boy. In that institution, as in every other, a certain number of lads were found to be unfit for cadet work, and Lieut. Steever devised a special course in physical training for this class that would bring them up to normal. One boy with a heart lesion plugged away for two years before the doctors pronounced him ready for the squad. To-day he hasn't a weak spot in his whole body.

Looking over his ground, Lieut. Steever hit upon a new idea, that not only accentuated the nonmilitaristic emphasis but also gave promise of stimulating youthful ardor to an even higher pitch. It was decided to let each squad have a sponsor, chosen from the girls of the school, who should be a member of the squad to all intents and purposes, sharing in high hopes, softening juvenile savageries, and giving a note of chivalry to the competitions.

As spring wore away the gymnasium was deserted for the open field, and Lieut. Steever's eyes turned longingly to the mountains. It took a bit of arranging, but consent to two weeks of "camping out" was gained at last, and a joyous morning came when the cadets marched out of Cheyenne at a double quick, singing at the top of their young voices. Singing, by the way, is a Steever hobby.

Once in camp instruction commenced to take wide sweeps. The boys learned to pitch their tents, to do their own cooking, and were taught the all-important fundamentals of sanitation and personal hygiene. There were extended-order drills and skirmishes, first aid to the injured practice, signal corps work, trench digging, map reading, and map making; the secrets of woodcraft and plaincraft were revealed to them, and they even reached a point where they flung a sturdy bridge across a turbulent little mountain stream.

Hard and fast orders were never given. From the first Lieut. Steever bent every energy to make the clean-cut distinction between leadership and drivership. In camp he prefaced all new departures by conferences with the boys, "doping it out together," in order that the smallest cadet should understand the "why." In his own school days he had been a member of the cadet corps in Washington, and he still remembered his boyish revolt against the "rock-crusher" style of drilling.

The two types of military instruction—intelligent obedience and unthinking acquiescence—got a competitive test in the Boer War. The autocratic English system failed, and victory rested with the democratized, thinking citizen soldiers of Australia and Canada.

Target practice naturally proved a joyous feature of cadet life for the Wyoming boys. Rifles were borrowed from the War Office, and here again the competitive note was introduced by having the squads shoot one against the other for medals. Lieut. Steever holds the world's rifle record at 200, 500, and 1,000 yards, and to-day he makes the flat assertion that every visit to the range sees him hard pressed by his cadets for first honors.

In December, 1912, the third tournament was held, and as a sign of improvement the wall-scaling record was cut from 25 seconds to 14.

Now came a distressful interim. Lieut. Steever was ordered away from Wyoming, and spent 1913 and 1914 down on the Mexican border herding revolutionists. During his absence the cadet corps stood pat, holding its membership and interest, but the organization was too young to do without a guiding hand, and the mothers and fathers of Wyoming sent a call to Washington for the return of "the father of the idea." The demand was heeded, and as soon after January 1, 1915, as trains permitted Lieut. Steever was back on the job in Cheyenne.

But why Cheyenne alone? Had not the plan proved itself sufficiently to warrant its extension to other Wyoming towns? Well, he'd have a try at it, anyway. So over to Laramie went Lieut. Steever; but even before he began to recite his arguments the school board said, "Go to it. We've been watching your work in Cheyenne, and it looks mighty good to us." Rawlins and Casper returned similar answers, and so did Newcastle, Douglas, and Lander. To-day every municipality in Wyoming has either given its high school over to the cadet idea or is building a gymnasium by way of preparation for it, and contiguous sections of Montana and Nebraska are asking for Steever.

In February, 1915, the first intercity cadet tournament was held in Cheyenne. Casper sent one squad, Laramie two, Cheyenne entered three, and not even the famous frontier days caused larger measure of excitement in Wyoming. To the amazement of all but its devoted supporters, the Casper squad raced away with the gold medals, hanging up the remarkable time of eight seconds in the wall-scaling competition. It was a victory that enabled Lieut. Steever to point a smashing moral. The ages of the Casper squad ranged from 12 to 18, but not a youngster of the eight had ever touched tobacco in any form or been a victim to any evil habit.

The lesson was not allowed to lose its vividness. In May, 1915, a second intercity tournament was held, this time with Rawlins added to the list, and again the Casper squad carried off first honors. Wall scaling calls for five trials, and three times that gallant little eight did the trick in six and one-fifth seconds, a fourth run in six and three-fifths, and the fifth run in six and four-fifths. Think of it! A 15-foot dash, a wall 8 feet 4 inches in height, each youngster with a heavy rifle in his hands, and the eight of them piling over in six and one-fifth seconds!

Is it any wonder that of the four-year boys in the Wyoming high schools only 5 out of every 25 have less than 40-inch chests?

Patriotism, when unaccompanied by physical fitness, is not the splendid and effective passion that the pacifist gentlemen would have us believe when they declare that America's call for defenders would find a million men in arms by nightfall. The records prove that 50 per cent of the men who offer for enlistment can not be accepted, and that 50 per cent of those who are accepted die before the firing line is reached because they can not stand the hardships of the open.

The idea must not be gained, however, that the Wyoming plan cares for nothing but a boy's chest and legs. There are scholarship squads as well as wall-scaling squads; and while the competitions are not fought out before cheering thousands, there are medals for the winners, and the rivalry is just as keen. Squad leaders are elected; they take turns choosing members, as in the case of the other squads, and the fight is to hang up the highest average in every branch of school work. These scholarship squads have their sponsors to urge them on, and the standings are posted on the bulletin board every week, medals being awarded at the end of the term. One squad leader, whose team had lost in the tournament, set sail for a scholarship medal, and he won it by going to the homes of his backward members at night for the purpose of helping them with their lessons. Not very much "militarism" about that!

After five years of demonstration, the Steever idea has won the official stamp of approval by Wyoming and its people, regardless of class and circumstance, creeds and prejudices. Not one single prophesied evil has flowed from it, while the good results have exceeded the most sanguine expectation.

The principals of the high schools unite in this declaration: "Since the organization of the cadet corps truancy is no longer a problem, nor do our boys quit school for a premature entrance into industry. School life has been made interesting, and we have no trouble in keeping them for the complete course."

The juvenile judges say: "We are the doctors, but Lieut. Steever is the sanitarian. We prescribe, but he prevents. There used to be about 8 per cent of delinquency among high-school boys, but the self-discipline and self-restraints of the cadets have wiped it out."

The warden of the penitentiary makes this succinct statement: "If Lieut. Steever gets them, I don't."

These results are no more mysterious nor miraculous than the commonest of common sense. Every youngster wants his squad to walk away with the medals, and the first lesson brought home to him is the absolute necessity of "keeping in shape." When a squad finds that its chances of success are being endangered by the weakness of some one member, the cause is ferreted out, and unless he chooses to "cut it" of his own accord, drastic action is taken. All the moral preachments of the good and all the harsh discipline of martinets could not begin to compare with the results obtained by the boys themselves.

"Brickie," for instance, was Wyoming's most notorious "bad boy." He was the despair of parents, police, and school authorities, and when "Brickie" decided to become a cadet the high-school principal sent for Lieut. Steever. "He hasn't a single redeeming quality," she moaned. "He is cruel, predatory, vicious, cunning, and as for honesty, he can lie faster than a horse can trot. If ever a boy was headed straight for the penitentiary, that boy's 'Bricky.'"

Now, the trouble with "Brickie," as with almost every other "bad boy," was that his imagination and dynamic energies had never been provided with proper channels. As a consequence, they "backed up" and made a swamp full of evil growths. The cadet work gave "Brickie" these necessary channels, and his stagnancies drained off until his whole being ran sweet and clean.

His methods, to be sure, were a trifle summary. If a squad member didn't quit cigarettes and the other things that made for physical unfitness, "Brickie" gave him a trouncing. But his interest was the interest of the squad, and day by day he poured the fire of his own enthusiasm into the other seven until every one of them stood as fine and strong as "Brickie" himself.

Another tremendous benefit lies in the complete elimination of class distinction and caste lines. Snobbery finds it impossible to live in the democratic atmosphere of the cadet corps, for just as every squad has its weak and strong so it is made up of the rich and the poor, the Fauntleroys and the Smikes. A feature of the cadet year is the parties given by the sponsor, or by the squad itself under the supervision of the sponsor, and it may be the case that the sponsor is a banker's daughter, and the squad leader the son of a miner.

Another democratizing influence lies in the entertainment arrangements during the intercity tournaments. The boys and the sponsors are not sent to hotels, but are billeted on the members of the local corps. As a consequence the car conductor's son may be the guest in the home of the car conductor's president, or the son of a magnate may be occupying the spare room in the cottage of a workman. The time to sow the seeds of democracy is in youth, before prejudices have had a chance to harden.

A by-product of this system, by the way, is good breeding. No squad, when attending a party or visiting away from home, wants to be disgraced by a "rough neck." Lessons in deportment that would be resisted and derided if they came from adults are heeded when they proceed from squad pride.

The very selection of squad leaders is in itself a training in citizenship. At the beginning of each year an election is held by secret ballot. At the start boy politics exercised a dominant influence, and many inefficients were chosen because of personal popularity or social standing. It was soon seen that an inefficient leader meant an inefficient squad, and each succeeding election witnessed an increase in the intelligent voting that is based on the merit of the candidate rather than his personality. To-day the one thing that counts in a cadet election is the ability to deliver the goods.

Jim, for example, was a lad who reached up from one of the dark holes of the world and caught the bottom rung of life's ladder. He started to climb, and at the time he entered the high school he was paying his way by all sorts of janitor work. The very courage that carried this boy over obstacles was the courage that wins out in cadet work, and there came an election when the votes of well-to-do boys named the young furnace cleaner as squad leader.

The most careful inquiry in Wyoming fails to reveal the slightest foundation for the fear that military instruction will irresistibly incline the juvenile mind to martial pursuits. The four years of cadet work in the high school seems to satisfy the military desire of the normal boy. This is borne out by the experience of Boston, where compulsory military training in the schools has been in effect for 50 years. The percentage of enlistment in the United States Army from Boston and its six suburbs is one-half of 1 per cent, the lowest in the United States.

The large emphasis of this article has been placed upon the civic ideals of the Wyoming idea because it is from this direction that attack comes principally. But the results obtained constitute an answer not only to the "professional" pacifist, but also to the "professional" militarist who remains wedded to the obsession of a standing army. Competent defenders are made as well as intelligent citizens. No less an authority than Maj. Gen. Wood commends unstintedly the military values of the Wyoming system in these words:

"Give these Steever cadets three months in a training camp for the purpose of coordinating what they have learned, and familiarizing them with the work in the mass, and you will have as fine and effective a body of troops as ever took arms in defense of a country. The high-school training gives the boys the sound physical base that is the first essential to any rational plan of national preparedness. It teaches the important lessons of abstinence and self-mastery and forms the invaluable habits of discipline and cooperative effort. Above all, it ground them in the fundamentals of military science and training, lifting them high above the raw volunteers who are the despair of officers in a crisis."

Certainly no plan of an adequate national defense yet broached deserves larger consideration than the Wyoming idea. Aside from the fact that it gains every desired result without the slightest impingement upon American ideals, there are the added advantages of simplicity and economy. Given a gymnasium, which no school should lack, the only additional expense lies in the erection of scaling walls and the purchase of uniforms. In 1914, however, the Wyoming legislature passed a law providing a fund for furnishing uniforms to the cadets, and this generous example could be followed with profit by other States.

Also it is in the province of the War Department, by act of Congress, to lend rifles, bayonets, cartridge belts, and canteens to such cadets, and to supply each individual with 120 rounds of ammunition annually.

No larger task remains, then, than the division of the United States into districts, and the assignment of Army officers to school duty in these districts.

The problem of continued instruction, contained in the scheme of a national reserve, is solved by the very summer camps that are an integral part of the regular cadet work. As they fall during the vacation period the district officer would merely transfer his activities from the school to the open for the three months of June, July, and August.

Two weeks would serve the needs of the school-going cadet, but graduates would remain the full three months in order to gain the coordination suggested by Gen. Wood. For the next 2 years these graduates need report only for 2 weeks, and, for the following 3 years, 10 days a year. Six years of it—from 19 to 25, say—without interrupting the business of life, and then inclusion in the great trained national-reserve force ready for any exigency of national peril.

The War Department is already committed to the policy of supplying these camps with all necessary equipment, as well as the necessary instructors and the personnel for the organization and maintenance of camp-wagon transports, medical care, and sanitation.

Here, then, is a plan that has stood the test of five years of practice—a plan based upon voluntary action, without suspicion of militarism, and admittedly productive of better citizens as well as fit defenders.

It is in this very absence of compulsion that the inherent weakness of the scheme is found. To be forced to wait on the voluntary action of individual school boards is to put the entire problem of national defense at the mercy of the community. Nor will it suffice to assume that the success of the plan will lead inevitably to its universal spread.

Education is the imperative need of democracy, and no principle is more firmly established than compulsory school laws; yet even to-day four States are without such laws, poisoning the wells of progress with their high percentages of illiteracy. If Commonwealths can not be trusted to appreciate an obvious necessity like education, may more patriotic answers be expected from localities in the more or less abstract matter of national defense?

To realize its full possibilities, the training of citizen soldiers must be universal, and this means such measure of Federal authority as will bring even the most backward community into line. The very fact that only 5 per cent of the 16,000,000 grade-school pupils ever enter high school forces home the conclusion that the system of military instruction must embrace the upper grades of the ward schools.

There is no validity in the outcry against compulsion. It is one of those "bogey" words that arise at regular intervals to befuddle and retard. As applied to the business of national defense, it is no more undemocratic than the compulsion that is used in education, health laws, sanitation laws, workmen's compensation laws, or in the very criminal code itself. In its essence it is not compulsion at all, but merely majority enforcement of such action as majority agreement deems necessary for the advancement and protection of the Nation, the State, the city, and the individual.

Each year in the United States 1,000,000 youths enter manhood's estate. The training of these boys during their school days is the one democratic solution of the problem of America's "unpreparedness." When all is said and done, the chief value of the Wyoming experiment is its positive proof that such training can be given with advantage to democracy, and without hurt to the individual, to the community, or to free institutions.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following as a separate section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding, after section 81, on page 88, the following as a new section:

That the Secretary of War is hereby required to investigate the operation of the military establishment of the Republic of Switzerland, and to report to the Congress not later than the second session of this Congress whether the system of such establishment or some modification thereof, if adopted by the United States, would, in his opinion, increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a commission to investigate the military establishment of a foreign country is not germane to this bill.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it is entirely in order. It is not a resolution of inquiry, because it requires the Secretary of War to investigate and report, and could have been reported either as a bill or as a resolution. Mr. Speaker Carlisle, who was one of the best presiding officers this House ever had, ruled it made no difference whether a legislative provision was contained in a bill or a resolution, if it was within the jurisdiction of a particular committee. It is also within the scope of the bill and is drawn with particular reference to the title. In the bill containing 85 sections relating to so many different things, including the American National Red Cross, atmospheric nitrogen, and the Regular Army, a reserve army, a volunteer army, and militia organization, it can scarcely be said that it is not germane to the subject matter of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hopes that the gentleman from Virginia will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order. Will the gentleman from New York permit us to vote upon the amendment without any debate?

Mr. BENNET. If I can have three minutes.

Mr. HAY. Very well.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I regard this bill as very largely an educational proposition; and I do not think the majority of the House—and I say it without any desire to be offensive—are military experts. We have heard a good deal about this Swiss system.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question there?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is the gentleman aware that there is a Senate document covering this very subject which was published within about six weeks?

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman is not aware of that; and if the gentleman from Vermont can give me his assurance that that is the case, I have no desire to burden the bill with any unnecessary provisions.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I have one in my office.

Mr. GARDNER. I can give the gentleman the reference now.

Mr. BENNET. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 82. That to provide for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen by the development of water power, or any other means, necessary to establish an adequate supply of nitrogen, the appropriation of such sum or sums of money to construct the necessary plant for such purpose is hereby authorized.

Several Members rose.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a request in order to expedite the passage of this bill. I ask unanimous consent that this section and debate upon it and all motions upon it may be deferred until we get through with the reading of the remainder of the bill and that it then be considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that section 82 may be passed until the conclusion of the remainder of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 83. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to maintain, upon military reservations or elsewhere, camps for the military instruction and training of such citizens as may be selected for such instruction and training, upon their application and under such terms of enlistment and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War; to use, for the purpose of maintaining said camps and imparting military instruction and training thereat, such arms, ammunition, accouterments, equipments, tentage, field equipage, and transportation belonging to the United States as he may deem necessary; to furnish, at the expense of the United States, subsistence and medical supplies to persons receiving instruction at said camps during the period of their attendance thereat, to authorize such expenditures, from proper Army appropriations, as he may deem necessary for water, fuel, light, temporary structures, not including quarters for officers nor barracks for men, screening, and damages resulting from field exercises, and other expenses incidental to the maintenance of said camps, and the theoretical winter instruction in connection therewith; and to sell to persons receiving instruction at said camps, for cash and at cost price plus 10 per cent, quartermaster and ordnance property, the amount of such property sold to any one person to be limited to that which is required for his proper equipment. All moneys arising from such sales shall remain available throughout the fiscal year following that in which the sales are made, for the purpose of that appropriation from which the property sold was authorized to be supplied at the time of the sale. The Secretary of War is authorized further to prescribe the courses of theoretical and practical instruction to be pursued by persons attending the camps authorized by this section; to fix the periods during which such camps shall be maintained; to prescribe rules and regulations for the government thereof; and to employ thereat officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army in such numbers and upon such duties as he may designate.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following as an additional section.

The Clerk read as follows:

After section 83, page 90, line 4, insert a new section, 83a, as follows:

"That in order to provide for the common defense and under such regulations as the President may prescribe and within the limits of appropriations available for that purpose, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to procure, by purchase or manufacture, and to store and accumulate such number of United States small arms, artillery, munitions, equipment, and military stores and appliances as will be necessary to arm, uniform, and equip the able-bodied men of the United States for military service in time of war."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I think that is in the bill now, and it would be simply reenacting the law. I have no objection to it personally.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I was afraid that the provisions of section 59, which authorize the Secretary of War expressly to buy and store and accumulate arms for the National Guard might limit the general power that ought to belong to the Nation.

Mr. SHERLEY. The trouble with the gentleman's amendment is that he is probably not enlarging the authority. We have absolutely such authority now. For instance, the authority which we exercise now in the fortification appropriation bill, which is a bill that provides for reserve matériel, is very much broader than the provision that the gentleman is proposing. What the gentleman is now asking the House to do may limit it. Broader powers already exist. I can see no reason for the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to take some portion of my five minutes to explain why this amendment is necessary. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have found in the last few years that whenever there are any suggestions made for an appropriation to buy arms that we had reports from the Secretary of War, or rather from the Ordnance Department, that all we needed was, first, an army of 400,000 men, and with those in addition to the Regular Army it would be sufficient, and we could wait to get more arms until war came upon us. I have spoken on this subject once before, but I want to say to the committee that we find now that it is very difficult to get more arms. If you take rifles alone, the total capacity of the Government manufactories is 500,000, or half a million, a year, working night and day, three shifts, and it would take 40 years to get the 20,000,000 rifles necessary for our able-bodied population of 20,000,000. If we take the capacity of private manufacturers and factories as a criterion, it was a whole year after war began abroad before they began to ship any arms, and after a year and four months they are able only to ship 3,400 a day, 100,000 a month, or 1,200,000 a year; and we need millions. There are 5,000,000 boys of the proper age in our public schools; there are 500,000 in our colleges who want training. We want these stores, and any bill for the military efficiency of the United States under these circumstances should lay down primarily the proposition that it is the duty of the Secretary of War, under proper regulation and so far as appropriations are made therefor, to provide for arming the Nation in case of need. Mr. Chairman, I move my amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the effect of this amendment is not to give either to the Secretary of War or to Congress or to anybody else any power which is not now possessed, and does not mean you get one single gun or one single round of ammunition. It simply is hurriedly undertaking to put in a bill an authorization of power, power that already exists in ampler form than what is suggested by the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey. Now, what you are liable to do is to adopt an amendment that instead of enlarging the power will curtail it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Has the gentleman noticed in section 59 we have put in such power, which, I think, is a limitation, because it is limited to aid for the National Guard alone?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, but the gentleman is mistaken about that. I happen to know, because I have in charge the bill which deals very largely with reserve war matériel. We are not dependent upon the provisions of this bill for our authority, and the amendment that the gentleman offers will not increase the authority. If it does anything, it will be liable to curtail it, but it will in no sense aid in the acquiring of a proper reserve.

Mr. STERLING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. STERLING. Can the gentleman tell us how many arms we have now—how many guns?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, the gentleman from Illinois is asking a question I will go into detail on in the fortification bill, but that bill does not deal with small arms. Touching rifles, my memory is we have something like 700,000 Springfields and 300,000 Krag-Jörgensens.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey), there were—ayes 19, noes 76.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 84. That the President, in time of war or when war is imminent, be empowered, through the head of any department of the Government, in addition to the present authorized methods of purchase or procurement, to place an order with any individual, firm, association, company, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry for such product or material as may be required, and which is of the nature and kind usually produced or capable of being produced by such individual, firm, company, association, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry.

That compliance with all such orders for products or material shall be obligatory on any individual, firm, association, company, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry and shall take precedence over all other orders and contracts theretofore placed with such individual, firm, company, association, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry, and any individual, firm, company, association, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry failing to comply with the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than three years and by a fine not exceeding $50,000.

That the compensation to be paid to any individual, firm, company, association, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry for its products or material shall be fair and just.

That the President in time of war or when war is imminent is authorized to appoint a board on mobilization of industries essential for military preparedness, nonpolitical in nature, and is authorized to take all necessary steps to provide for such clerical assistance as he may deem necessary to organize and coordinate the work hereinbefore described.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 84 the following:

"That the Secretary of War shall make a list of all officers of the Army who have been placed on the retired list for disability and shall cause such officers to be examined at intervals as may be advisable, and such officers as shall be found to have recovered from such disabilities or to be able to perform service of value to the Government sufficient to warrant such action, shall be assigned to such duty as the Secretary of War may approve."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

One page 90, after the word "industry," in line 21, add the following:

"And any individual, firm, association, company, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry owning or operating any plant equipped for the manufacture of arms or ammunition, or parts of ammunition, or any necessary supplies or equipment for the Army, and any individual, firm, association, company, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry owning or operating any manufacturing plant which, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, is capable of being readily transformed into a plant for the manufacture of arms or ammunition, or parts thereof, or other necessary supplies or equipment, who refuses to give to the United States such preference in the matter of the execution of orders, or who refuses to manufacture the kind, quantity, or quality of arms or ammunition, or the parts thereof, or any necessary supplies or equipment, as ordered by the Secretary of War, or who refuses to furnish such arms, ammunition, or parts of ammunition, or other supplies or equipment, at a reasonable price, as determined by the Secretary of War, then and in either such case the President, through the head of any department of the Government, in addition to the present authorized methods of purchase or procurement herein provided for, is authorized to take immediate possession of any such plant or plants, and, through the Ordnance Department of the United States Army, to manufacture therein in time of war, or when war is imminent, such product or material as may be required, and any individual, firm, company, association, or corporation, or organized manufacturing industry."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from Virginia——

Mr. HAY. I have no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the further amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 91, in line 5, after the word "material," add "or as rental for use of any manufacturing plant while used by the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 59, line 3, to offer the following amendment, which is suggested by the Secretary of the Navy, because he is afraid that we are doing something with the Naval Militia. I will read it. It says:

Page 59, line 3, after the word "force," add the following:

"And not to the Naval Militia, which shall consist of such part of the militia as may be duly prescribed in each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] asks unanimous consent to return to section 45 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 50, line 3, after the word "force," add the following:

"And not to the Naval Militia, which shall consist of such part of the militia as may be prescribed in each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I understand that we return, under the agreement, to section 82.

The CHAIRMAN. We return to section 82.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend——

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I was going to suggest to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] that we will probably make some time if we can agree upon a limit of time for debate.

Mr. HAY. I am going to do that as soon as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] offers an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be in order in a moment. The committee has returned to section 82, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] is recognized.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out section 82.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 88, strike out section 82, comprised in lines 10 to 15, inclusive.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEVER. Would a motion in the nature of a substitute have preference over the motion of the gentleman from Illinois?

The CHAIRMAN. It would. A motion to strike out a paragraph would have preference.

Mr. LEVER. If so, I will offer the following as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] offers an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LEVER offers as a substitute for section 82, on page 88, the following:

"That the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture are constituted a commission, whose duty it shall be to ascertain the practicability and best means of producing within the United States nitrogen compounds by the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen, or otherwise, and of obtaining potash from kelp, alunite, feldspar, or any other material, for use in the manufacture of an adequate supply of munitions of war and fertilizers.

"The commission may use the various agencies of the Government and may cooperate with States and with private persons or agencies in carrying out its purposes, and shall report to Congress as early as practicable, not later than the first day of the next regular session of this Congress, the facts ascertained, together with recommendations for action by Congress.

"The commission may elect a chairman, and the funds appropriated for its use shall be paid out on warrants signed by him or by an acting chairman designated by him, drawn on the Secretary of the Treasury.

"There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, available until expended, the sum of $100,000, to enable the commission to carry out its purposes, including the hire of experts, clerks, and other employees, and payment of rent, traveling, and other expenses, within and outside of the District of Columbia."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE], I would like to see if we can not arrange——

Mr. LENROOT. I make the point of order on the amendment first.

Mr. LEVER. I make the point of order that the point of order comes too late.

Mr. LENROOT. It has just been read. I have not had opportunity to make it before. I make the point of order that the amendment is not in order, in that it goes much beyond the scope of the original amendment and provides for a matter that is not at all germane to this bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. And I make the further point that it carries an appropriation.

Mr. LENROOT. And makes an appropriation itself.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. LENROOT. I do make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LEVER offers the following amendment in lieu of section 82, page 88:

"SEC. 82. That the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture are constituted a commission, whose duty it shall be to ascertain the practicability and best means of producing within the United States nitrogen compounds by the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen or otherwise, and of obtaining potash from kelp, alunite, feldspar, or any other material for use in the manufacture of an adequate supply of nitrogen and potash.

"The commission may utilize the various agencies of the Government and may cooperate with States and with private persons or agencies in carrying out its purposes, and shall report to Congress as early as practicable, not later than the first day of the next regular session of this Congress, the facts ascertained, together with recommendations for action by Congress.

"The commission may elect a chairman, and the funds appropriated for its use shall be paid out on warrants signed by him or by an acting chairman designated by him, drawn on the Secretary of the Treasury.

"There is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, available until expended, the sum of $100,000, to enable the commission to carry out its purposes, including the hire of experts, clerks, and other employees, and payment of rent, traveling and other expenses within and outside the District of Columbia."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a substitute.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by substituting for section 82, on page 88, the following:

"SEC. 82. That the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture are constituted a commission, whose duty it shall be to ascertain the practicability and best means of producing, within the United States, nitrogen compounds by the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen, or otherwise, and of obtaining potash from kelp, alunite, feldspar, or any other material, for use in the manufacture of an adequate supply of munitions of war.

"The commission may utilize the various agencies of the Government and may cooperate with States and with private persons or agencies in carrying out its purposes, and shall report to Congress as early as practicable, not later than the first day of the next regular session of this Congress, the facts ascertained, together with recommendations for action by Congress."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I make the same point of order upon that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear from the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER].

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I would prefer that the Chair hear from the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] on the proposition. But, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this amendment is in line with the general purposes of the bill under consideration. This bill is a bill to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States. The amendment which I have offered proposes to create a commission the duty of which shall be to investigate the processes by which nitrogen may be extracted from the air or the processes by which it may be had from any other source. It likewise empowers the commission to investigate the possible sources of potash.

Now, when the Chair keeps in mind the fact that nitric acid and potash are absolutely necessary in the manufacture of high explosives it seems to me that any proposal here that looks to increasing efficiency in getting these materials would be germane to this bill and in order upon this bill.

The Chair will observe that in the last amendment which I have offered the appropriation is eliminated, and it only creates a commission with a view of developing the best means of getting potash and nitrogen for use in the manufacture of munitions of war.

I may say very frankly that in eliminating fertilizers I realize that the Chair was right in his ruling on my previous amendments, which included them; but I hope that in another body some of these days, if this amendment is agreed to, we may include fertilizers.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, section 82 in the bill authorizes an appropriation to secure the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen by the development of water power or any other means necessary to establish an adequate supply of nitrogen.

Section 82 relates to nothing else. The amendment now proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] provides for a commission to ascertain the practicable and best means of producing within the United States nitrogen compounds by the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen or otherwise and of obtaining potash from kelp, alunite, feldspar, or any other material for use in the manufacture of an adequate supply of munitions of war, clearly going far beyond the scope and the intent of section 82 as it is written, which relates only and solely to the authorization of an appropriation for securing nitrogen by the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen, and therefore the gentleman's amendment is clearly out of order.

In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, I merely state the proposition laid down or the position taken by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] in his ruling that——

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I thought the gentleman from Wisconsin was through. I want to get recognition in my own time.

Mr. LENROOT. Where there is an authorization for an appropriation in a bill an amendment providing for a commission to investigate is not a germane amendment.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, if the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] is not in order, I do not see how the section of the bill to which the amendment relates, can itself be in order. Plainly this portion of the bill is in order, because it makes provision, in an indefinite and unsatisfactory manner, it must be conceded, for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen, with a view to securing material used in making high explosives. Without this material it is insisted that modern war can not be waged.

If the Chair will look to the section proposed to be amended, he will find that the section standing alone will be utterly ineffective to accomplish the purpose intended. The section provides, it is true, for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen by water-power development, and authorizes the appropriation of such sums of money as may be necessary to construct the appropriate plants. But who is to take over the use, and application of these funds? Who is the commission, board, agent, or other functionary, who will control the expenditure of the appropriation contemplated, select the site, or location, best adapted to the end in view, and establish the plant, or plants, that will be needed to make effective the purpose of this section of the bill?

The amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina contemplates the creation of an official agency that will utilize and expend the funds appropriated in the direction of certain preliminary work looking to the establishment and location of the plants necessary to secure in needful quantities the acid required for high explosive ammunition. Instead of being plainly out of order, as suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin, the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina is plainly in order, for the very palpable reason that it seeks to make effective a section which, in its present form, leaves the whole project of the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen in the air for the lack of the necessary agencies to make the section effective.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will look into that volume of Hinds' Precedents which contains the decision of Mr. Watson, of Indiana, in the Fifty-ninth Congress, the Chair will find the only place where there is a scintilla or shadow of support for the position of the gentleman [Mr. LEVER] who offers this amendment. It was held in that particular instance by the distinguished author or compiler of that book to be a particular instance. There is no other instance in the precedents of Congress where a provision for a commission was held to be in order as a germane substitute for a substantive proposition in a bill.

As the Chair, of course, is aware, the requisite elements in reference to germane amendments are, first, that the amendment must be germane to the title; second, that it must be germane to the substance of the bill; and, third, when offered to a particular section, that it must be germane to the section.

When I had the honor to sit in the place that the gentleman now presiding occupies, in connection with the Commerce Court bill, in the Sixty-first Congress, with more time at my disposal than the gentleman has had in connection with this particular section, I looked up all the authorities, and although I voted in the Fifty-ninth Congress for the amendment declared to be in order by the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Watson, I ruled, as I had to in accordance with the precedents, that that ruling was wrong, and that a ruling for a commission, which may be germane to the title and may be germane to the subject matter, is not and never has been held to be germane as a substitute for or an amendment to a particular section.

And, of course, the reason for it, in addition to those that I have given, is clear, that the basic proposition of an amendment calling for the appointment of a commission is the appointment of a commission, whereas the basic subject matter of any section not relating to the appointment of a commission is the putting into law of some proposition not involving a commission. And that has been the uniform ruling of chairmen and Speakers ever since there have been precedents on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has listened with great interest to the arguments on this question. The Chair is unable to see why the last proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina is not in order. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER].

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I should like to arrange for time on this section. How much time does the gentleman from California desire?

Mr. MANN. I will say, butting in, that the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has requests from 15 different gentlemen, most of whom want 10 minutes each. It is now half past 3 o'clock. I presume there will be at least two roll calls before the bill is passed. Is the gentleman from Virginia insistent upon having a final vote on the bill to-night?

Mr. HAY. Yes; that was the understanding on both sides of the House, I believe.

Mr. MANN. It was the understanding that we would endeavor to do that. I did not know whether it would be practicable to get everything disposed of up to the final vote.

Mr. HAY. We have everything except this.

Mr. MANN. I am quite willing, as far as I am concerned, to stay here until the final vote, because the gentleman from Virginia has been very lenient and courteous in debate.

Mr. HAY. Suppose we say an hour on a side, which will take us until half past 5 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. I do not know how gentlemen will manage. I have already relinquished my time. I had applied for 10 minutes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I will get along with two minutes.

Mr. MANN. Some of the gentlemen will have to get along with three minutes instead of five; but part of the time of the gentleman from California is to go to that side of the House.

Mr. HAY. I think we can get along with an hour on a side.

Mr. MANN. I am willing to try it if the rest are.

Mr. HAY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in two hours, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and the other half by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate upon section 82 and all amendments thereto shall be closed in two hours, one hour to be controlled by himself and one hour by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. LENROOT. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from Virginia whether it is his intention to yield some of his time to those upon his side who are opposed to the section?

Mr. HAY. I heard only a moment ago that some gentlemen over here wanted some time, but in view of the number of requests which I have had, I do not see how we can yield time to those who are opposed to the section.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, I want to ask the gentleman from California whether he is in favor of striking out this section?

Mr. KAHN. No; but all who have requested time of me are opposed to the provision.

Mr. HAY. I think the time should be apportioned between those who are in favor of the section and those who are opposed to it.

Mr. LENROOT. That is all I desire.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the question. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER]. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] asks unanimous consent that debate upon section 82 and all amendments thereto shall be closed in two hours, one-half of the time to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. FERRIS. Reserving the right to object, which I do not intend to do, I merely wish to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] if he does not think that inasmuch as some of us are opposed to it, and both the gentlemen controlling the time are in favor of it, that there ought to be some agreement——

Mr. HAY. But the gentleman from California has just stated that he was going to yield all his time to gentlemen who are opposed to this provision. Is that correct?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield for a question?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. The committee divides itself in this way: There are those who are opposed to section 82 as it stands; there are those who are opposed to any provision on this line, even in the form of an amendment; there are some of us who are opposed to section 82 if we can get such a proposition as I have offered instead. Failing to get such a proposition as I have offered, some of us will probably vote for section 82 as it stands in the bill. Now, I want to ask the chairman of the committee if the proponents of the amendment which I have offered are going to be yielded any time out of the hour which he has requested for the affirmative side of this question?

Mr. HAY. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. LEVER. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I certainly think this side of the question ought to have more than five minutes, even if I do not control it myself.

Mr. HAY. But, Mr. Chairman, everybody knows the merits of this proposition. Everybody has been talking about it, and there will not be very much added to the sum of knowledge about it by a long debate. Everybody here is a more or less intelligent man. The proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina is a very plain one, and we all understand it, and I do not think we ought to take the time to debate this matter to any great extent.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. LEVER. Reserving the right to object, I wish to say to the gentleman from Virginia that personally I do not care for more than five minutes, but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] here, for instance, wants to discuss the amendment which I have offered, and I feel that the proponents of the proposition which I have offered have a right, certainly, to more than five minutes out of an hour.

Mr. HAY. We will give the gentleman from Illinois some time out of our hour.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. In case unanimous consent is given according to the request of the chairman of the committee, Mr. HAY, will it preclude the offering of amendments?

Mr. HAY. It will not preclude the offering of amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. It will not preclude the offering of amendments, but it will close debate. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think if we voted now we would get along better. Everybody knows what we are going to do. Let us take the vote on it now.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER].

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. LEVER. I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 29, noes 103.

So the Lever amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. McKENZIE moves to strike out section 82, page 88.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McKENZIE) there were—ayes 122, noes 100.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 154 ayes and 128 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12766) to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on what is known as the Gardner amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the amendment striking out section 82.

The SPEAKER. Is there a demand for a separate vote on any other amendment?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask a separate vote on what is known as the Anthony amendment.

The SPEAKER. What is the subject of it?

Mr. HAY. That amendment is to section 11.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, notwithstanding the fact that the previous question is considered as ordered, that the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] may offer what is known as the Kahn amendment, to be disposed of without debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that, notwithstanding the previous question has been considered as ordered, the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] may be permitted to offer his amendment, to be disposed of without debate. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman couple with it the right to move to recommit shall be waived?

Mr. MANN. We shall not exercise the right as far as the gentleman from California is concerned, or as far as I am concerned. We do not expect to move to recommit, although I can not pledge everybody on this side or on the other side of the aisle.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that the other amendments be disposed of?

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments other than those upon which separate votes have been demanded?

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the Gardner amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 26, by inserting, after the word "for," in line 9, the following:

"Provided, That after the expiration of one year's honorable service any enlisted man of the Regular Army, whose company, troop, battery, or detachment commander shall report him as proficient and sufficiently trained, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be furloughed to the Regular Army reserve, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, in which event he shall not be eligible to reenlist in the service until the expiration of his term of seven years."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. On that, Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 203, nays 198, answered "present" 2, not voting 30, as follows:

The name of Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington was called, and he answered "Present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Kahn amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KAHN moves to amend, on page 13, line 12, by striking out the words "one hundred and forty" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "two hundred and twenty," and add at the end of the section the following:

"That not exceeding 45,000 of the force provided in this section shall be distributed among the various arms of the line in such manner and in such proportion as the President may prescribe."

SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 24, 1916.

Rev. G. Livingston Bayard, chaplain, United States Navy, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, the high and mighty Ruler of the Universe, we humbly beseech Thee, as for the people of these United States in general, so especially for their Senate in Congress assembled, that Thou wouldst be pleased to direct and prosper all their consultations, to the advancement of Thy glory, the good of Thy church, the safety, honor, and welfare of Thy people; that all things may be so ordered and settled by their endeavors, upon the best and surest foundations, that peace and happiness, truth and justice, religion and piety may be established among us for all generations.

O Lord our God, who hast vouchsafed to take to Thee this Nation, by wonders and by wars, by a mighty hand and by an outstretched arm, make us to know this day, and consider it in our hearts, that Thou the Lord art God, in heaven above and in the earth beneath, and that there is no God else beside Thee.

O God and heavenly Father, we commend to Thy almighty protection our soldiers and sailors, who in the service of our country go forth to fight our battles. Strengthen them in the maintenance of our country's honor and safety and preserve them from the violence of the enemy.

And may it please Thee to direct all in authority, that our international troubles may speedily come to an end and result in the advancement of that happy day for which we fight and for which we pray when all nations shall dwell together in righteousness and peace to the glory of Thy holy name. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXPORTS AND IMPORTS (S. DOC. NO. 366).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting, in response to a resolution of January 17, 1916, a report prepared in the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce on foreign commerce and the tariff, which, on motion of Mr. GALLINGER, was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to offer a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 147) was read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 20,000 copies of the report of the Secretary of Commerce in response to Senate resolution 10, relating to the value of imports and exports.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. The resolution does not provide for the reprint of a public document?

Mr. SIMMONS. No. I will state to the Senator the matter was called for in Senate resolution No. 10, which is as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate information regarding the value of imports, exports, and import duties under the present and the two preceding tariff acts, with a special statement for the period from the enactment of the existing tariff act to the outbreak of the European war, compared with a corresponding period of the previous year; the value of imports, compared with the value of domestic production, and the expenditure for wages in each industry before the outbreak of the European war; and the imports and exports of leading manufacturing countries during recent years.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is the report which has just come in in response to that request.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is the report in response to this request of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I was wondering whether there was a necessity for 20,000 copies.

Mr. SIMMONS. The resolution calls for the printing of 20,000 copies——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I wish to say that I am heartily in favor of the adoption of this resolution. I assume it will go through as a matter of course, but I think the importance of the resolution, owing to the information that will be conveyed to the American people, is very great at this time.

We have had a great deal of talk in the newspapers, in the Congress, and in the country on the subject of the dumping of European industries after this war is over, the threatening of American industries on account of low tariff rates, and the importance of the selection of men supposed to be wiser than we are who can advise the Congress of the United States how to run the business of the Government and prevent a catastrophe that is feared by those uninformed as to present industrial conditions in this country and Europe.

Mr. President, when we attempt to determine the difference of cost between the great industries of this country and those abroad, we must find some standard by which it can be measured. Without a standard there is no way to ascertain the difference in cost. The question naturally arises in the beginning, Are you going to select the best industry in a particular line of business in this country or the worst, or are you going to select an average of the best and the worst, which means nothing, because any tariff rates based on a comparison of an average between your best and the worst would give too much protection of necessity to the best and of necessity injure the worst? When you go to the foreign country you meet the same difficulty. Are you going to compare your industries in America with the best or the worst in Europe?

Mr. President, it is unquestionably a fact that there is no basis of comparison. More than that, there can be no comparison made at this time. There is not an industry in Europe that is in a normal condition. More than 80 per cent of the manufactured imports that come into this country from abroad come from Europe. The imports that you receive from Asia and Africa are largely raw materials, and you do not need anybody to ascertain what the cost price is. You can take up a London paper or a New York paper any day and ascertain what wool is selling for in Australia or at what price other raw material is selling around the world.

The great manufacturing interests of the world that compete with the interests of America produce their products on European soil. There is not an industry in Europe to-day that is in a normal condition. In many of them the wheels of their factories and foundries are stopped. In many of them they have changed their entire labor conditions. Instead of working trained, well-organized men in their factories they have got raw recruits in women labor to turn out their products. The talk to-day of sending wise men to Europe to ascertain industrial conditions, to my mind, is about as absurd a proposition as it would be to measure the flood tide of a river at the time of an unusual drought.

But I am heartily in favor of this resolution. If the facts that are to be reported have been carefully and properly prepared, they will give some real idea of conditions, which the business interests of this country are entitled to know and entitled to meet. No matter what may be the difference in cost between production in this country and abroad, no matter how difficult it may be to ascertain it, there is one fact that you can ascertain, and ascertain with accuracy at the customhouse every day, and that is the amount of importations of certain goods coming into America. At least every 10 years, and as a rule every 5 years, we are furnished with the statistics by the Census Bureau showing us the amount of production of given articles in this country and the amount of the American consumption; and when you ascertain at the customhouse the amount of imports that are coming into the United States in any given industry and compare it with the production of that same industry and the consumption of that same industry in the United States, you have a reasonable basis on which to determine whether the American manufacturer is unduly driven to the wall by foreign competition, or as to whether you have built a tariff wall so high that you are giving the American manufacturer a monopoly within American territory and unduly cutting off your revenue at the customhouse.

The only safe guide, in my judgment, to the question as to whether importations are pressing unduly on American industry or not is gained at the customhouse. The Senator from North Carolina seeks to have printed that information for the benefit of the Congress and the American people, and I am glad to know that, although that information was provided for in the law passed more than three years ago, to-day it comes to the Congress and to-day we may get the benefit of it; and I hope the executive department will continue to furnish the Congress with this information that we may have the benefit of it to guide us in our future legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HARDWICK submitted an amendment providing that the Rural Mail Delivery Service shall be extended so as to serve as nearly as practicable the entire rural population of the United States, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 10484), which was referred to the Committe on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. OWEN. Pursuant to the notice which I gave a few days ago, I submit a resolution and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Rules.

Resolved, That the standing rules of the Senate be, and they hereby are, amended as follows:

At the close of Rule XXII add:

"Provided, however, That when any 10 Senators, in writing, move that the debate should be brought to a close, the Chair shall, without permitting any debate thereon, put the question to the Senate—

"'Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate should be brought to a close?'

"And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative by a two-thirds vote of those voting, then the pending question, bill, or resolution shall be in order to the exclusion of all other questions and business. And thereafter, the motion being so carried, no Senator shall be entitled to speak more than one hour in all on the question, bill, or resolution, or amendments thereto, or on any motion affecting the same.

"No dilatory motion shall be in order, and it shall be the duty of the presiding officer to declare such motion out of order when the question of order is raised by a Senator, or to immediately submit the question without debate to the Senate."

SHIPMENT OF FOOD SUPPLIES TO POLAND.

Mr. HITCHCOCK submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 148), which was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to the Senate information as indicated below, if not incompatible with the public interest:

First. What is the present attitude of the British Government concerning the shipment of food supplies and other necessaries of life to the suffering people of Poland? Will Great Britain permit such supplies to be sent without interruption or delay from the United States to Amsterdam or any other neutral port in Europe?

Second. If the British Government makes limitations or conditions or requires guaranties from the Government of Germany, what are the conditions and restrictions and what are the terms of the guaranties required of the German Government?

Third. What action, if any, has Germany taken toward giving the guaranties that may have been required by the British Government?

Fourth. To what committees or authority in Poland may supplies be forwarded and consigned?

Fifth. To what extent is the actual work of relief in Poland being carried on, and under whose supervision and control?

Sixth. What are the facts at the present time as to the shipment, transportation, receipt, and distribution of supplies? Can these proceedings be taken, or are they delayed by pending negotiations with Great Britain and Germany, or either of them?

MR. SEWARD'S LETTER TO MR. CORWIN.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I ask to have placed in the RECORD a letter from the secretary to the Counselor for the Department of State, transmitting a copy of a letter written by William H. Seward, Secretary of State, to Thomas Corwin, United States minister to Mexico, on April 6, 1861, in regard to intervention in Mexico.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COUNSELOR FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 15, 1916.

Hon. ROBERT L. OWEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As requested, I inclose herewith a copy of letter written by William H. Seward, Secretary of State, to Thomas Corwin, United States minister to Mexico, on April 6, 1861.

Yours, sincerely,
IRA H. PATCHIN,
Secretary to the Counselor.

[Inclosure.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 6, 1861.

To THOMAS CORWIN, Esq.

SIR: The actual condition of affairs in Mexico is so imperfectly understood here that the President finds it very difficult to give you particular and practical directions for the regulation of your conduct during your mission.

Our latest information was, in substance, that the provisional government of President Juarez, so long confined to the seacoasts of the country, had finally overthrown its adversaries and established itself at the capital; that the opposing armies had been demoralized and dispersed, and that there was no longer any armed resistance in the States. That an election for President had been held in conformity with the constitution of 1857, and that the now provisional President had probably secured a majority of the votes, although the result was as yet not certainly known. The pleasure which these events have inspired is unhappily diminished by rumors that the Government is without sufficient authority or hold on the public confidence to maintain order; that robberies are of frequent occurrence on the high roads, and even that a member of our late legation in the country has been murdered on his way from the city of Mexico to Vera Cruz.

You will apply yourself at once with energy and diligence to investigate the truth of this last-mentioned occurrence, which, if found to have been accurately reported, will not only be regarded as a high offense against the dignity and honor of the United States, but will prove a severe shock to the sensibilities of the American people.

The President is unable to conceive that any satisfactory explanation of a transaction so injurious to the character of Mexico can be made. He will, however, wait for your report concerning it, though with the deepest anxiety, before taking action upon the subject.

I find the archives here full of complaints against the Mexican Government for violations of contracts and spoliations and cruelties practiced against American citizens. These complaints have been lodged in this department from time to time during the long reign of civil war in which the factions of Mexico have kept that country involved, with a view of having them made the bases of demands for indemnity and satisfaction whenever government should regain in that country sufficient solidity to assume a character for responsibility. It is not the President's intention to send forward such claims at the present moment. He willingly defers the performance of a duty, which at any time would seem ungracious, until the incoming administration in Mexico shall have had time, if possible, to cement its authority and reduce the yet disturbed elements of society to order and harmony. You will, however, be expected in some manner which will be marked with firmness as well as liberality, to keep the Government there in mind that such of these claims as shall be found just will in due time be presented and urged upon its consideration.

While now, as heretofore, it is a duty of this Government to reason with that of Mexico and deprecate a continuance of the chronic reign of disorder there, a crisis has unhappily arrived in which the performance of this duty is embarrassed by the occurrence of civil commotions in our own country, by which Mexico, in consequence of her proximity, is not unlikely to be affected. The spirit of discontent seems at last to have crossed the border and to be engaged in an attempt to overthrow the authority of this Government in some parts of the country which adjoin the Mexican Republic. It is much to be feared that new embarrassments of the relations of the two countries will happen when authority so long prostrated on the Mexican side finds the power of the United States temporarily suspended on this side of the frontier. Whatever evils shall thus occur it is much to be feared will be aggravated by the intervention of the Indians, who have been heretofore with difficulty restrained from violence, even while the Federal authority has been adequately maintained.

Both of the Governments must address themselves to this new and annoying condition of things with common dispositions to mitigate its evils and abridge its duration as much as possible.

The President does not expect that you will allude to the origin or causes of our domestic difficulties in your intercourse with the Government of Mexico, although that Government will rightfully, as well as reasonably, ask what are his expectations of their course and their end. On the contrary, the President will not suffer the representatives of the United States to engage in any discussion of the merits of those difficulties in the presence of foreign powers, much less to invoke even their censure against those of our fellow citizens who have arrayed themselves in opposition to its authority.

But you are instructed to assure the Government of Mexico that these difficulties having arisen out of no deep and permanent popular discontent either in regard to our system of government itself or to the exercise of its authority, and being attended by social evils which are as ruinous as they are unnecessary, while no organic change that is contemplated could possibly bring to any portion of the American people any advantages of security, peace, prosperity, or happiness equal to those which the Federal Union so effectually guarantees, the President confidently believes and expects that the people of the United States, in the exercise of the wisdom that hitherto has never failed them, will, speedily and in a constitutional way, adopt all necessary remedies for the restoration of the public peace and the preservation of the Federal Union.

The success of this Government in conducting affairs to that consummation may depend in some small degree on the action of the Government and people of Mexico in this new emergency. The President could not fail to see that Mexico instead of being benefited by the prostration or the obstruction of Federal authority in this country would be exposed by it to new and fearful dangers. On the other hand, a condition of anarchy in Mexico must necessarily operate as a seduction to those who are conspiring against the integrity of the Union to seek strength and aggrandizement for themselves by conquests in Mexico and other parts of Spanish America. Thus even the dullest observer is at last able to see what was long ago distinctly seen by those who are endowed with any considerable perspicacity that peace, order, and constitutional authority in each and all of the several Republics of this continent are not exclusively an interest of any one or more of them but a common and indispensable interest of them all.

This sentiment will serve as a key to open to you, in every case, the purposes, wishes, and expectations of the President in regard to your mission, which I hardly need to say he considers at this juncture perhaps the most interesting and important one within the whole circle of our international relations.

The President of the United States does not know and he will not consent to know with prejudice or undue favor any political party, religious class, or sectional interest in Mexico. He regrets that anything should have occurred to disturb the peaceful and friendly relations of Mexico with some of the foreign States lately represented at her capital. He hopes most sincerely that those relations may be everywhere renewed and reinvigorated and that the independence and sovereignty of Mexico and the Government which her people seem at last to have accepted, after so many conflicts, may be now universally acknowledged and respected.

Taking into view the actual condition and circumstances of Mexico, as well as those of the United States, the President is fully satisfied that the safety, welfare, and happiness of the latter would be more effectually promoted if the former should retain its complete integrity and independence than they could be by any dismemberment of Mexico with a transfer or diminution of its sovereignty, even though thereby a portion or the whole of the country or its sovereignty should be transferred to the United States themselves. The President is, moreover, well aware that the ability of the Government and people of Mexico to preserve and maintain the integrity and the sovereignty of the Republic might be very much impaired under existing circumstances by hostile or unfriendly action on the part of the Government or of the people of the United States. If he needed any other incentive to practice justice and equality toward Mexico, it would be found in the reflection that the very contention and strife in our own country, which, at this moment, excites so much domestic disquietude, and so much surprise throughout a large part of the world, could probably never have happened if Mexico had always been able to maintain with firmness real and unquestioned sovereignty and independence. But if Mexico has heretofore been more unfortunate in these respects than many other modern nations, there are still circumstances in her case which justify a hope that her sad experience may be now coming to an end. Mexico really has or ought to have no enemies. The world is deeply interested in the development of her agricultural, and especially her mineral and commercial, resources, which it holds in high respect the simple virtues and heroism of her people and, above all, their inextinguishable love of civil liberty.

The President, therefore, will use all proper influence to favor the restoration of order and authority in Mexico, and, so far as it may be in his power, he will prevent incursions and every other form of aggression by citizens of the United States against Mexico. But he enjoins you to employ your best efforts in convincing the Government of Mexico and even the people, if with its approval you can reach them, that the surest guaranty of their safety against such aggressions is to be found in a permanent restoration of the authority of that Government. If, on the other hand, it shall appear in the sequel that the Mexican people are only now resting a brief season to recover their wasted energies sufficiently to lacerate themselves with new domestic conflicts, then it is to be feared that not only the Government of the United States, but many other Governments, will find it impossible to prevent a resort to that magnificent country of that class of persons unhappily too numerous everywhere who are accustomed to suppose that visionary schemes of public interest, aggrandizement, or reform will justify even lawless invasion and aggression.

In connection with this point it is proper that you should be informed that the Mexican Government has, through its representative here, recently complained of an apprehended attempt at invasion of the State of Sonora by citizens of California, acting, as is alleged, with the knowledge and consent of some of the public authorities in that State. You will assure the Mexican Government that, due care being first taken to verify the facts thus presented, effective means shall be adopted to put our neutrality laws into activity.

The same representative has also expressed to the President an apprehension that the removal of the Federal troops from the Texan border may be followed by outbreaks and violence there. There is, perhaps, too much ground for this apprehension. Moreover, it is impossible to foresee the course of the attempts which are taking place in that region to subvert the Federal authority of this Government. The President, however, meantime directs you to assure the Mexican Government that due attention shall be bestowed on the condition of the frontier with a view to the preservation and safety of the peaceable inhabitants residing there. He hopes and trusts that equal attention will be given to this important subject by the authorities of Mexico.

These matters, grave and urgent as they are, must not altogether withdraw our attention from others to which I have already incidentally alluded, but which require more explicit discussion.

For a few years past the condition of Mexico has been so unsettled as to raise the question on both sides of the Atlantic whether the time has not come when some foreign power ought in the general interest of society to intervene to establish a protectorate or some other form of government in that country and guarantee its continuance there. Such schemes may even now be held under consideration by some European nations, and there is also some reason to believe that designs have been conceived in some parts of the United States to effect either a partial dismemberment or a complete overthrow of the Mexican Government with a view to extend over it the authority of the newly projected confederacy which a discontented part of our people are attempting to establish in the southern part of our own country. You may possibly meet agents of this projected new confederacy busy in preparing some further revolution in Mexico. You will not fail to assure the Government of Mexico that the President neither has nor can ever have any sympathy with such designs in whatever quarter they may arise or whatever character they may take on.

In view of the prevailing temper and political habits and opinions of the Mexican people the President can scarcely believe that the disaffected citizens of our own country who are now attempting a dismemberment of the American Union will hope to induce Mexico to aid them by recognizing the assumed independence which they have proclaimed, because it seems manifest to him that such an organization of a distinct Government over that part of the present Union which adjoins Mexico would, if possible, be fraught with evils to that country more intolerable than any which the success of those desperate measures could inflict even upon the United States. At the same time it is manifest that the existing political organization in this country affords the surest guaranty Mexico can have that her integrity, union, and independence will be respected by the whole people of the American Union.

The President, however, expects that you will be watchful of such designs as I have thus described, however improbable they may seem, and that you will use the most effective measures in your power to counteract any recognition of the projected Confederate States by the Mexican Government if it shall be solicited.

Your large acquaintance with the character of the Mexican people, their interests, and their policy will suggest many proper arguments against such a measure if any are needful beyond the intimations I have already given.

In conclusion, the President, as you are well aware, is of opinion that, alienated from the United States as the Spanish-American Republics have been for some time past, largely perhaps by reason of errors and prejudices peculiar to themselves and yet not altogether without fault on our own part, those States and the United States nevertheless in some respect hold a common attitude and relation toward all other nations; that it is the interest of them all to be friends as they are neighbors, and to mutually maintain and support each other so far as may be consistent with the individual sovereignty which each of them rightly enjoys, equally against all disintegrating agencies within and all foreign influences or power without their borders.

The President never for a moment doubts that the Republican system is to pass safely through all ordeals and prove a permanent success in our own country and so to be commended to adoption by all other nations. But he thinks also that that system everywhere has to make its way painfully through difficulties and embarrassments which result from the action of antagonistical elements which are a legacy of former times and very different institutions. The President is hopeful of the ultimate triumph of this system over all obstacles as well in regard to Mexico as in regard to every other American State, but he feels that those States are nevertheless justly entitled to greater forbearance and more generous sympathies from the Government and people of the United States than they are likely to receive in any other quarter.

The President trusts that your mission, manifesting these sentiments, will reassure the Government of Mexico of his best disposition to favor their commerce and their internal improvements. He hopes indeed that your mission, assuming a spirit more elevated than one of merely commerce and conventional amity, a spirit disinterested and unambitious, earnestly American in the continental sense of the word, and fraternal in no affected or mere diplomatic meaning of the term, while it shall secure the confidence and good will of the Government of Mexico will mark the inauguration of a new condition of things directly conducive to the prosperity and happiness of both nations and ultimately auspicious to all other republican States throughout the world.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

RURAL CREDITS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that on Monday next, the 27th instant, at the conclusion of the routine morning business, I intend to address the Senate on the subject of a Landschaft system of rural credit in the United States.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I beg to tender a resolution, and I ask that it be read and lie on the table. I desire to address the Senate at the earliest convenient moment upon the subject of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 146) was read, as follows:

Whereas it is known to the authorities of the United States that funds and supplies are being furnished to the force and following of Francisco Villa in Mexico from foreign countries and from sources in the United States of America; and

Whereas such supplies and sustenance are being delivered for the purpose of being used against the soldiers of the United States and to oppose the authority of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That those who are furnishing such supplies and sustenance to the forces of Villa for the purpose of opposing the United States are the enemies of the United States, and those in the United States who are furnishing supplies and sustenance to the said Villa and his forces, either of money or provisions, arms and ammunition, are within the provision of the laws of the United States defining treason as giving aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States.

Resolved, That those in the United States who are giving such support, affording supplies, ammunition, and aid to the Villa forces against the soldiers of the United States are guilty of indirect treason, within the meaning of the law, against the sovereignty of the United States and its authority.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution lie over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the rule?

Mr. LEWIS. Under the rule, Mr. President. I shall call up the resolution at the proper time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the resolution will go over under the rule.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before that is done——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho, of course.

Mr. BORAH. Before that is done, may I ask to have the resolution reread? I only caught a portion of it. If it is as I understand it to be, I should like to offer a matter in connection with it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the resolution.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask to have read the telegram which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

DOUGLAS, ARIZ., March 23, 1916.

Hon. A. B. FALL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Mexican general has 40 pieces of artillery and 3,000 cavalry stationed 10 blocks from center of Douglas and 7,000 cavalry stationed 6 miles south of Douglas. We have only 1,800 Infantry, 300 Cavalry, and 4 pieces of artillery. Our troops are stationed 2 miles east of Douglas. Am reliably informed that it would take one hour for our troops to reach Douglas in case of night attack. Our Army forbidden by administration from making any active defensive preparations for fear Mexicans might misconstrue such preparations. Mexicans have intrenched against United States side and have barb-wire entanglements. We have no intrenchments. Mexican troops could easily repeat Columbus massacre in Douglas on a much greater scale and return to Mexico with similar loss. All of these statements can be verified by our Army officers here. Help us, if you can, before it is too late.

D. A. RICHARDSON.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask to have the telegram read which I send to the desk. It is in relation to the same situation referred to in the telegram presented by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and has been sent and received to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the telegram will be read.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

DOUGLAS, ARIZ., March 24, 1916.

Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Washington, D. C.:

Reports yesterday appeared reliable, but seem now to have been exaggerated. Think, however, additional protection is needed.

S. W. WHITE.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have received one or two communications of a similar import to those which have just been read, which I have delivered to the proper administrative authorities of the Government.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, it would have been better if all these communications had been delivered to the War Department, instead of being read in the open Senate. I confess myself unable to understand why Senators desire at this critical period to present communications of this nature, and thereby give to them a kind of official dignity, if not sanction.

Mr. President, I do not know who the man is who sent the telegram to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and which has been presented by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] except as the name was read, nor do I know anything of the man who sent the one presented by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD].

Mr. SHEPPARD. If the Senator from Missouri will permit me, I wish to say that I know personally the signer of the telegram which I presented. He was a former county judge in Texas, and is a man of high character and of entire reliability. I introduced the telegram merely in order to allay any undue feeling of danger that might have been excited by the telegram sent to the desk by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I received a telegram myself similar to the one which was presented by the Senator from Idaho, as did also the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I referred my telegram to the President and the War Department.

Mr. BORAH. I have no apology to offer for my action. This telegram relates to a matter this side of the border. It is an appeal for help of American citizens at home.

Mr. STONE. Oh, no; the Senator is not required to make an apology.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly not.

Mr. STONE. He acts on his own responsibility.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; and not on that of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. The Senator did not act on my responsibility. If he had, he would have acted with greater propriety.

Mr. BORAH. There seems to be no doubt about that at all in the mind of the Senator from Missouri. The record of the Senator from Missouri justifies that modest statement.

Mr. STONE. I think it does. That is one thing about which we agree.

Mr. President, when a man becomes obsessed with the idea that he is running for President of the United States, he is all too apt to be influenced by some vain delusion, and is likewise too apt to think he promotes one vain delusion by exploiting another.

Mr. President, of course Senators can do as they please. They can offer anything they wish; they can make any kind of speeches they wish; but just what public good is to be accomplished by a proceeding like that we are considering surpasses intelligent understanding.

I called and spent some time this morning at the State Department and at the War Department to ascertain what the latest official information is which these departments had received about Mexican affairs. Every man with sense enough to come in out of the wet knows that the situation in Mexico is critical at this moment; critical in this sense, that an effort is being made by numerous people in Mexico—and, I am sorry to say, outside of Mexico—to excite the people of that unfortunate country, to mislead them, to impress them with the idea that the United States contemplates aggression against the Government and against the people of Mexico, to their great injury. It is not true; but people with sinister motives, in and out of Mexico, are striving to create that impression and to excite the Mexican Government and people against the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, is this proceeding by unanimous consent?

Mr. STONE. Yes; it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no objection whatever, provided unanimous consent may be allowed to other Senators to address the Senate on the same subject. On that understanding, I do not object.

Mr. STONE. I can not enter into any understanding about that. If the Senator objects, I will sit down.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not object. I simply want in return the courtesy that, if any Senator on this side wants to reply, equal privilege may be accorded to him.

Mr. STONE. I shall not object.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

Mr. STONE. I shall not myself object to any Senator saying what he pleases, but I can not agree that the Senator himself may not object or that some other Senator may not object.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not ask the Senator to make any agreement; I simply desired to know whether the debate was proceeding by unanimous consent——

Mr. STONE. It is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And to express the hope that if it was so proceeding, equal courtesy would be accorded to Senators on this side.

Mr. STONE. The Senator knew all that without making the inquiry.

I say, Mr. President, that influences such as I advert to are operating along the lines I have indicated. The President has given it out by proclamation and by diplomatic communication with the head of the de facto government in Mexico that the expeditionary force sent in pursuit of the bandits who attacked Columbus, N. Mex., was not in derogation of the sovereignty of Mexico nor in a spirit of unfriendliness to that Republic. The administration has sought to impress that correct and wise view of this Government's attitude on the people and on the de facto government of Mexico.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, and the Senate unanimously voted its opinion.

Mr. STONE. I was just about to make that observation. A day or two after the proclamation by the President and the publication of his communication to Gen. Carranza a resolution offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] was unanimously agreed to by the Senate indorsing the act of the President and reiterating the policy and purposes of this Government as announced by the President. Notwithstanding that, there are influences at work—and we know it—in this country as well as in Mexico, perhaps cooperating in some instances and perhaps acting separately in other instances, to arouse a hostile public opinion and to create a condition in Mexico that would embarrass this Government in carrying out the purposes it has in view, and thus precipitate a situation the end of which we know not of.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand a synopsis of reports received at the State Department this morning from consular representatives of the United States at different points in Mexico. Conditions in the City of Mexico on yesterday were comparatively normal. The people generally were giving approval to the action taken by this Government and to the declaration of the purpose of this Government. The general feeling at the capital of Mexico was one of sympathy with what was being done by this Government.

Consul Letcher, at Chihuahua, reports as follows:

Report of Gen. Herrera's defection from Carranza entirely unfounded.

In that connection I will read a dispatch from Gen. Funston to the Secretary of War, received this morning:

Gen. Herrera, in a telegram to Gen. Gavira—

Who is the commandant at Juarez—strongly denies all reports that he has gone over to Villa; and Gen. Guiterres, governor of Chihuahua, in a letter to Gen. Gavira, also strongly denies that Gen. Herrera has gone over to the aid of Villa.

Yet, Mr. President, only yesterday and the day before certain newspapers were parading before this country with startling headlines that Gen. Herrera, with 2,000 cavalry, had deserted the Carranza government, allied himself with Villa, and probably was bent on cutting the communications between our national border and the expeditionary force under Gen. Pershing.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator a question, if he will permit me. Does the Senator, who is chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, consider that our forces in Mexico are, from a military point of view, entirely safe under present conditions?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I am not, as is the distinguished Senator from Illinois, a great military expert. I would not put my judgment on that great question against his. He is so much better trained along those lines than I that if he thinks our forces in Mexico are in danger, and he must think that, for he has offered a resolution here for 50,000 volunteers to go to Mexico——

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. STONE. To be sure.

Mr. SHERMAN. I asked the Senator from Missouri, who is chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, what his opinion was—not that of the military experts whom he quotes. Will the Senator answer?

Mr. STONE. I will. I will answer in this way: I get my information on this subject from men on whose judgment I have a right to rely. I would rather take the opinion of the Chief of Staff of the Army, of the generals in command, of the Secretary of War, and of the President of the United States, who are in daily, if not hourly, communication with the men at the front. If they were in danger, and additional forces are necessary, I assume—I am bound to assume—that the Secretary of War and the generals of the Army, who are in command of the situation, would know about it and would not hesitate, for the safety of our troops and the welfare of our country, to inform the Congress and take such action as the situation demanded. That is my answer to the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri further yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator, if I have understood his answer correctly, is still relying upon the opinions of others. I asked him for his opinion upon this situation, which up to this time I have not had. I am not professing to be an expert. The Senator's sarcasm is entirely wasted on the subject matter.

Mr. STONE. I really think so myself.

Mr. SHERMAN. My nerves are not exposed on that question either to ridicule or to sarcasm. My purpose was, if the Senator will allow me to add the statement, to tender friendly help to the executive department in the event it was needed.

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I asked the Senator for his opinion in answer to a question, which I have not had; and I again ask him what is his opinion upon the situation?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I apologize to the Senator for misleading him into the belief that I really thought he was a military expert. That was not really my intention.

Mr. President, if gentlemen want to force a fight, they can have all of it they want. Take that position, Senators, if you wish to embarrass the administration. If you are seeking to force war with Mexico, if that is what you want, have the courage to say so like men. Do not thrust yourselves into this situation in a half-masked, ungallant, and insincere way. Do it openly and boldly, if that is what you want.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. STONE. Oh, yes; I yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the Senator if he thinks that a tender from even a single Senator, if he would be allowed to express his friendly solicitude, of help to protect the forces already in Mexico, if in the judgment of that Senator—however insignificant or lacking in knowledge he may be—such help was desirable, would be regarded as provocative of war in Mexico, although it might tend, if favorable action were had, to calling 50,000 volunteers? I ask the Senator whether he thinks that would promote war, under the wording of this resolution, when they are to join with the de facto government in Mexico for the mere precaution, upon the Senator's view, of moral suasion upon those gentlemen who are somewhat hostile in their attitude in the rear of Gen. Pershing?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Illinois had desired to proceed in this matter in a proper way along the line he is now suggesting; if he had wished really to get upon a high plane like that he has described, he would have sought the Secretary of War and those in command, and would have gotten from them the information upon which he might have predicated an intelligent judgment. He did not do that. He breaks forth here on his own motion, without consulting anybody who has a right to know and does know, and offers a resolution to enlist 50,000 men for use in Mexico—against whom? Not against Villa. So far as we know, the forces now under our command and available are ample to deal with any force under the command of Gen. Villa.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Wait a moment. Then, for what purpose are these 50,000 men desired?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. It must have been to wage war upon somebody else. But such action would be a threat, and would naturally be accepted as a threat by the Mexican government and the Mexican people—a threat on our part to wage war not alone upon Villa, but upon the whole Mexican people.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And the de facto government.

Mr. STONE. Yes; and the de facto government.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. STONE. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. I fear the Senator has not sufficiently digested the resolution, nor has he read the accompanying statement.

Mr. STONE. Yes, I did. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator to point out a threat in any tangible form, contained either in the resolution or in the accompanying statement.

Mr. STONE. Oh, I would not expect the Senator in terms to say that we asked the enlistment of these men to invade Mexico and wage war on the de facto government and its people with whom we are at peace. He would not have said that; but I can conceive of no other purpose, and no other conclusion could be reached by the de facto government or the people of Mexico.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. STONE. I will.

Mr. CLAPP. I certainly was very much impressed with the earlier remarks of the Senator from Missouri. I regret that these matters come up in this form; and while it may seem out of place for me to say anything in criticism, in view of the age and experience of the Senator from Missouri, I do regret the turn which the remarks have taken in the latter portion of them. I fear that there is too much of a proneness to attribute political partisan bias to action in this body.

I believe that the Senator from Illinois, while it might have been well for him to have consulted the War Department, felt that he and the Senate owed a duty to the country to show a willingness to tender practically unlimited support to the President of the United States. Yesterday, at the suggestion of Members on the other side that it might be unwise to precipitate a debate in this body upon this resolution, carefully guarded as it was, those who had prepared and had expected to say something upon the resolution, including the Senator from Illinois, upon the suggestion being made that it might embarrass the situation to press this matter or debate it in the Senate, very promptly acquiesced in the suggestion that it should not be taken up, that it might lie dormant for the present.

I fear the Senator from Missouri misjudges the motives and purposes of some. I think the motive of the Senator from Illinois—I know my own motive, and I believe the motive quite generally—is to avoid embarrassing the President.

Mr. STONE. I hope the Senator will conclude soon.

Mr. CLAPP. I will; but I feel, in view of the public criticism that is made of an apparent inactivity and apparent disregard of the necessities on the border and in Mexico, that the Senator from Illinois was warranted in proffering this support.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, it is well understood that there is a purpose—a well-defined purpose—on the part of some Senators to precipitate this debate. They are constantly offering resolutions of this nature, offering dispatches, newspaper articles, and all that. Now, we ought to have a clear and distinct understanding here as to just what is the situation in the Senate. I certainly have no wish to debate this question. I do not think this is a proper time for this debate. I think such matters ought not to be brought before the Senate at this time; but if you keep bringing them here——

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. OLIVER. I will ask the Senator if he is not the one who is now precipitating the debate, and if it is not all coming from him?

Mr. STONE. Oh, the Senator from Pennsylvania can have his own opinion about that. I am meeting——

Mr. OLIVER. I have a very decided opinion about it.

Mr. STONE. Well, keep it. The Senator is welcome to it.

Mr. OLIVER. I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is the presentation of concurrent and other resolutions.

Mr. SHERMAN subsequently said: Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois will state it.

Mr. SHERMAN. It would seem, from the remark of the Senator from Missouri, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, at the conclusion of his comment this morning, which may or may not have been intended for myself, so far as I know, that it is simply a question of lacerated sensibilities; and, so far as I can poultice those sensibilities, I apologize to him. I hope there will be no further manifestations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That does not seem to the Chair to be a matter of personal privilege.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, there was a kind of a gentlemen's agreement yesterday at adjournment that we would have an executive session this morning, but I understand that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. MARTIN of Virginia] wishes to call up an appropriation bill; and as I do not desire to stand in his way at all, I shall refrain from making the motion at this time.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask that House bill 13043, the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, be now taken up.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13043) making appropriations to supply further additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1916 and prior fiscal years.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment is, on page 5, to strike out beginning on line 6 down to and including line 15, and insert:

That payment of the salary of Ewing C. Bland from the appropriation entitled "Salaries, fees, and expenses of marshals, United States courts, 1915," for the period from December 12, 1914, to and including January 6, 1915, during which period services were rendered by him in good faith as United States marshal for the western district of Missouri, is authorized, notwithstanding the fact that his appointment was not confirmed by the United States Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A roll call has been commenced on the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. So that the Senate may know just what we are voting on, I should like to have the Secretary read the amendment again. There was so much noise in the Chamber that no one could hear what was stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again report the amendment upon which the roll call has been ordered.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss the question, but——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I make the point of order that we were in the midst of a roll call upon the adoption of the amendment, and that no debate is in order upon it.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is what I understood.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and called the name of Mr. ASHURST.

Mr. BORAH. Has the roll call proceeded so far as to shut off debate? I certainly want to know, if I can, what we are voting on. Does the amendment provide for salary——

Mr. ROBINSON. I rose for the purpose of explaining it.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to have the Senator do so.

Mr. ROBINSON. If there is no objection, I will explain it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate ought to know what it is voting on, at least.

Mr. ROBINSON. The amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia, or rather reported from the committee, will pay Mr. Bland for his services up until he was rejected by the Senate, but will not pay him for the time he actually served after he was rejected by the Senate. It was discussed the other day somewhat in detail. I am not going to attempt now to review the discussion that was then had, except to say that it is admitted the President had the power to make his recess appointment. It is unquestionably true that the rejection of this man by the Senate did not revoke the appointee's position, but that under the Constitution and under the law his commission continued until the 4th of March. If the Senate committee amendment is rejected, then the House provision will remain, which pays him for the time that he in good faith performed service. So if you want to pay Mr. Bland for the time that he served, the Senate committee amendment should be rejected.

Mr. BORAH. But if we desire to pay him only for the time before the Senate rejected the nomination then we vote for the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. If you desire to pay him only for the time he served prior to his rejection by the Senate you will vote for the amendment.

Mr. President, if the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] does not object, I should like to call to the attention of the Senate a case exactly in point on this question. In Twentieth Federal Reporter, in the case In re Marshalship for the southern, and so forth, districts of Alabama, it was decided that the rejection by the Senate of a recess appointment does not revoke the commission, but that the commission, unless otherwise revoked, continues until the 4th of March or the end of the session following the recess appointment. That case is almost exactly in point, and the court held that in this language:

> Section 1769 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides: "The President is authorized to fill all vacancies which may happen during the recess of the Senate by reason of death or resignation or expiration of term of office, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session thereafter * * *." The language used in the Constitution and in section 1769, in reference to the power of the President to fill vacancies is very much the same language in the act under consideration, authorizing the President to make temporary appointments in cases of suspended officers. The authorities on this subject—that is, the nature and duration of a temporary appointment made by the President to fill a vacancy—are that a commission issued by the President during a recess of the Senate continues until the end of the next session of Congress, unless sooner determined by the President, even though the person commissioned shall have been in the meantime nominated by the President to the office and his nomination rejected. (U. S. v. Kirkpatrick, 9 Wheat., 721; Case of Isaac Hill, 2 Op. Attys. Gen., 336; Gilpin v. O'Neil, 8 Int. Rev. Rec., 137; Ex parte Hennen, 13 Pet., 230.)
> It is said this is not a vacancy, and it is true it is not a vacancy in the absolute sense, such as results from the death, resignation, or expiration of term of office of the incumbent of the office, as contemplated by section 1769 of the Revised Statutes. In a case of the suspension of an officer there are contingencies upon the happening of which the suspended officer may resume the duties of the office—that is, where the Senate fails or refuses consent and advice to the nominations for office made by the President, and if this failure or refusal continues until the end of the session, and the former incumbent's time has not then expired, he will then, and not till then, resume the duties of the office. Whether it be a vacancy caused by the death, resignation, or expiration of term of office of the incumbent of the office, or whether it be a suspension of an officer by the President under section 1768, in either case the duration of the temporary appointment is the same; it is to the close of the session of the Senate, subject, as we have seen, to a concurrence of opinion and action by the President and the Senate, by the nomination and confirmation of a person other than the rejected nominee to the position.

That is exactly in point. In conclusion of the whole matter the commission of Mr. Bland was until the 4th of March. He served until that time. There was no one else who could have served, for the President had sent in a new nominee, but that nominee had not been confirmed. Therefore it was the duty of Mr. Bland to continue under his commission until the 4th of March, and it is the duty of the Congress to pay him up to the time he actually served.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Before the Senator takes his seat, I wish to know if the amendment which the Senator has brought to the attention of the Senate is the amendment proposed by the committee or is it an amendment by the Senator from Virginia to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is an amendment by the Senate committee to the House provision. I object to the amendment, and I think the House provision should be retained.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the decision to which the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] called attention undoubtedly states the law. The matter was discussed a day or two ago somewhat at length. I think we all conceded that that was the rule; that the mere fact that an appointment had been made during the recess which had been rejected by the Senate did not prevent the appointee from holding his office until the adjournment.

But that is not the real objection to this House provision. We have a general statute which provides that when a vacancy in the office happens while Congress is in session and an appointment is made by the President during the ensuing recess no salary shall be paid to an officer so appointed if he be thereafter rejected by the Senate.

That is precisely what occurred in this case. This vacancy originated while Congress was in session along in February, 1914. Congress remained in session until the following October, and during all of those months the President withheld any appointment to this office. Then Congress adjourned and was in recess from October until the ensuing December, a period of two months, and still the President withheld the appointment until within three days of the meeting of Congress, and then he made his recess appointment, the effect of which appointment would be that his appointee would hold until Congress adjourned, even though the Senate rejected the nomination.

If the President had waited three days longer, and sent the appointment in the regular way to the Senate, and it had been rejected as it was finally rejected, that would have ended the right of his appointee to hold office, but it is now proposed, by a special statute passed for the purpose, setting aside a wholesome general rule laid down in the general statute, without any excuse or semblance of excuse for so doing to pay this appointee a salary after his rejection by the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. The President could have made the appointment at any time after the vacancy arose if a satisfactory candidate could have been secured. I do not think it proper to criticize the President when he enjoys and exercises a constitutional prerogative. The President has this power under the Constitution. The statute to which the Senator refers was the product of a very bitter contest between President Johnson and the Congress, and surely the Senator from Utah would not feel justified in invoking such a statute in a case of this kind.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not care how the statute originated; the statute is a sound and wholesome statute, and its purpose is to prevent the happening of just such a thing as happened here.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will pardon me just a minute, I would not particularly criticize the President for withholding an appointment under some circumstances, but the thing which appeals to me most as deserving criticism is the fact that the President delayed all action until within three days of the meeting of Congress, and then, when he could have just as well waited three days longer and sent his appointment in in regular course, he made this recess appointment. I do not say that he did intend to do so, but I do say that if he had intended by that to have his oppointee draw a salary and hold office in spite of the fact that it was expected that the Senate would reject him he could not have acted any differently than he did.

I can conceive cases, one I illustrated the other day, where the vacancy might happen within a day of the adjournment and there would not be time for the President to act, and the appointment is made during the recess where Congress would be justified in setting aside the general statute by a special provision of this character. But certainly the general statute ought to remain in force, and it ought to be the guide and rule of Congress unless some reasonable excuse can be shown for departing from it.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator, suppose we vote "yea" for the adoption of the amendment, for what time will that allow pay to the marshal?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It will give the marshal pay until the date he was rejected by the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. From December 12 to January 6.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And deny him pay after the Senate rejected him.

Mr. BORAH. Then we will be paying him for the time he served under the President's appointment up to the time the Senate passed upon it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes. Even that is a departure from the general statute and is as far as we should go.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PENROSE (when Mr. OLIVER's name was called). My colleague [Mr. OLIVER] is unavoidably absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). As the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and I have agreed to transfer our respective pairs so that we may both vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). Under the statement of the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], I vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. He being absent, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DU PONT. I inquire whether the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. DU PONT. I have a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky, and, in his absence from the Chamber, I will transfer that pair to the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness. I also announce the absence of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] and of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], both of whom are paired.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendments——

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I move to insert, on page 3, after line 20, the following:

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

NATIONAL PARKS.

To cover the cost of repairing damages to bridges, roads, trails, building, etc., in the Platt National Park, Okla., $10,000.

Mr. President, in regard to this item I want to say that an estimate has been transmitted by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. William G. McAdoo, dated February 12, 1916, to the House of Representatives to cover this item; also an explanatory letter from the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Franklin K. Lane, dated February 10, 1916, and also a letter from the superintendent of the park, of January 23, 1916, showing what the damages were. There was a storm there which tore everything to pieces, and an overflow which took out the bridges. The appropriation is very urgently needed, and I hope the chairman of the committee will feel that he can accept the amendment.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. My attention was diverted for a moment and I did not hear all the Senator said.

Mr. OWEN. I expressed the hope that the chairman of the committee would accept the amendment. It has been estimated for by the Secretary of the Treasury and explained by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I can not accept the amendment; and, if the Senator is through, I will endeavor to give such reasons as I can to sustain the action of the committee in rejecting the amendment.

It seems that some years ago Congress established a national park adjacent to the town of Sulphur, in Oklahoma. Sulphur is a small town, with about 3,500 population. Why a national park should have been established adjacent to it is incomprehensible to my mind. It does not appear to be national in any respect; there are no curiosities there or developments of any sort that would distinguish it from a park adjacent to any other village of 3,500 people in the United States.

If there is any reason why a national park should have been established for the convenience of those 3,500 people, I have not heard of it. I myself believe, Mr. President, that there are more than 1,000 towns in the United States which have just as good claim to have the Nation maintain a park for their convenience as has this little town of 3,500 people in Oklahoma. I am sure that in Virginia we have several hundred towns and cities with more than 3,500 people, all of which would be delighted to have the National Government keep up a park for their comfort, their pleasure, their convenience, and their enjoyment.

There has not been given to the committee one single thought, one single fact, one single idea why a national park should be maintained at the town of Sulphur, in Oklahoma, that can not be given in favor of a national park at every town in the United States with 3,500 people.

If there be any reason for this expenditure, it ought to be given to the Senate. None was given to the committee, although I appealed to those who appeared and asked the question, "Is there anything national in the character of this park that calls for an appropriation at the hands of Congress?" If I am not mistaken, the representative of the Interior Department answered that he could not give any reason why it was national in its character. All he could say was that it had been established as a national park, and therefore the department had asked for this appropriation.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OWEN. I was not present when the request was made as to the reason for the establishment of this park. It has been established for many years. It was established before statehood in Oklahoma, and there would not have suggested itself to me any reason why the action of Congress many years ago should be constantly explained to the committee as a reason for continuing that which was justified in the first instance.

The Senator is under the impression, apparently, that this park was established for the convenience and benefit of the town of Sulphur. Nothing of the kind is true. This place, long before there was any town there, was a camping place to which people came from long distances in the Southwest, as many as four and five thousand people coming there to drink the waters found in this park, which are believed to have curative value. There are in that park various sulphur springs and bromide springs, and the reason why it was thought an advisable place to make into a public park belonging to the people of the United States was because of the number of people from the Southwest who came there in large numbers for the curative advantages of the water.

It is also in a way a natural park, containing, as it does, some large oak trees, which cover quite an area, and which make it a particularly attractive spot. About 175 feet above the place where this grove is located there are two great springs, flowing, I believe, 300,000 barrels of water a day. Altogether it is a very beautiful and attractive spot.

The late Senator Platt, of Connecticut, who had been long interested in Indian affairs, was interested in this matter, and afterwards the name was given to the park in honor of Senator Platt, of Connecticut.

There are only about six or eight hundred acres in the park, and the expense attached to its upkeep is very small.

It is true that the town of Sulphur has been built up there since the park was established by the Government, but the park was not established for the convenience of the town; the town came there because the Government took enough interest in this matter to establish the park and because of the curative value of the waters there. I did not know that it was necessary to explain every time the committee met what the original foundation of the park was, otherwise I should have presented the historical reasons; but I was absent at the time this matter came up, and I do not think the Senator is justified in refusing to carry on a public enterprise of this character because nobody appeared before the committee who was able to give a reason for the original foundation.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, in the first place, this is not a deficiency in any sense; it is a plain, straight appropriation to repair some damages resulting from a storm which occurred in a park adjacent to the town of Sulphur. It has no proper place on this bill, and I go further and say that the Senator has given no reason why the United States Government should maintain this park. He talks about there being a great spring there. Why, Mr. President, there are many places in my State which have great springs, one of them located in a ravine so that the water from the spring has a surface of more than 250 acres, making one of the most beautiful places in the whole country. There are other places all over the State where mineral springs are found, and to those places people go in great crowds every season; but it never entered anybody's mind that because there were one or more big springs or two or three big oak trees or because people went to the springs that the Nation ought to maintain a park for the amusement of those who come to drink the health-giving waters.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from Virginia, who lives in a country which is a park from one end to the other, does not realize the importance to a country which is a prairie country of having some great springs of this kind, which are not common in the West, but which are very common in the Commonwealth of Virginia. The Senator has so many springs in Virginia where people come from all parts of the country, and have been doing so for a hundred years, because of the health-giving properties of those springs, and has become so familiar with the benefits and advantages which flow from these springs, that he no longer regards them as of any consequence. It is a matter of great importance in the West.

I do not think the Senator's argument is sound that there is no justification in having a park maintained by the United States. The argument he makes, that the Government is not called upon to establish a park wherever there is a spring, is not a just and sound argument. The Government has followed the policy of establishing some parks in different parts of the country. There is not any other park down in the Southwest that I recall at this time. This poor little one-section park, just 600 acres, is the only park in the Southwest that I recall. I am astonished that the Senator from Virginia should try to kill the only enterprise of the kind that we have in the Southwest.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, the park will still be there, and these springs will still be there, whether the Congress appropriates to keep up the park or not. We do not propose to destroy the park or to dry up the waters.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator would not object to a bill being introduced to transfer these lands to the State of Oklahoma, as I understand, so that that State may maintain them as a park?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I should have no objection whatever. I should be glad to see the Government of the United States turn this park over to the State of Oklahoma or to the city of Sulphur; but I do say it is not just to the taxpayers of the United States to maintain a park there at national expense for the amusement and enjoyment of 3,500 people who happen to live in the town of Sulphur. I am utterly unable to differentiate it from any other town in the United States with 3,500 people. I think it ought to be stopped.

It is true this was established as a national park, but the appropriations ought to be discontinued. We can not maintain parks for the enjoyment of people all over the country; and unless we can, we ought not to make an exception for the people of the town of Sulphur. The committee did not think this was a deficiency at all; and they think, further, that as an original question the Government ought not to be required to maintain a park for the enjoyment of the people of this little town of 3,500 inhabitants.

I think the amendment ought to be rejected.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I dislike very much to disagree with the chairman of the Appropriations Committee; and if the vote were to be taken over again I would oppose making a national park of Sulphur, as I did when the park was originally established. But the two tribes of Indians that were most interested asked the Government to take this property and make a park of it, and the Government accepted their proposition and did take it. I tried several times while a member of the committee to get the committee to consent to turn the park over to the State, but that action has not been taken.

The truth of the matter is that the Government does own the park, and took it over for sentimental reasons; and I think it is the duty of Congress to make the necessary appropriations. Therefore I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me for just a moment, I will read what the representative of the Interior Department said in respect to this matter. The question was asked him:

> But there is nothing in this park of a national significance. It is just a Government park?
> Mr. ACKER. There are no wonders of nature there. It is a very pretty park. The land is of an undulating character, and there is a very pretty stream meandering through it. It is adjacent to this town.
> The CHAIRMAN. Is there any reason for the maintenance by the Government of a park there any more than there would be for maintaining a park adjacent to any other city in the country?
> Mr. ACKER. No reason that I know of.

This is a representative of the Interior Department, who stated that he was familiar with the premises and had visited this park personally. That is his answer. I asked him the question, and he said he knew of no reason whatever for maintaining it as a park any more than there was reason for maintaining a park in every town in the country.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I think it is true that there is no reason; but until we do turn it over to the State there is an obligation upon the part of the Government.

As I said a moment ago, I voted against the establishment of this park originally, and I should vote against it if it should come up again, and I should vote to turn it over to the State; but as long as the Government does own it Congress should make the appropriation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator from Oklahoma to say that there was a report from one of the departments here advocating this appropriation?

Mr. OWEN. The appropriation was estimated for by the Secretary of the Treasury, based upon a report from the Secretary of the Interior, supported by a report from the superintendent of the park. It is a Government obligation. It is not an obligation of anybody else. To belittle this Government obligation by charging that it is established for the amusement of 3,500 people in the town of Sulphur is not a sound argument for disregarding the obligations of the United States with regard to its public parks and its public property. The mere fact that it is in Oklahoma is no justification to the Senator from Virginia for denying this just claim.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, just one word in reply to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have not belittled the State of Oklahoma. Only the distress of the Senator could have induced him to make such a remark. I have intimated nothing of the sort. I have asked that some reason be given why this exception should be made; but the Senator has given none, and he is driven to the necessity of making arguments of that character.

As for this being an obligation of the Government, how does it become an obligation? It is a gratuity from the Government, which it can continue if it chooses to donate that much to that neighborhood, and can stop whenever it sees fit to stop it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have no interest whatever in this matter, and I am free to say that I have very little knowledge about the facts involved. What interest I have in it is purely of a sentimental nature. As the Senator from Oklahoma has said, my predecessor in the Senate, our great old Senator, Senator O. H. Platt, was an extremely good friend of the Indians. He served for years on the Committee on Indian Affairs, and was interested in everything that pertained to their welfare. Shortly after I came into the Senate, or possibly about the same time, this tract was made a national park by the Government. One of the first bills I introduced was a bill to name this beautiful little park in honor of my deceased and beloved predecessor, and I know that his widow was extremely gratified at the compliment.

I do not know of how much benefit the waters of these springs may be to the surrounding country; but I have been told that long before the town of Sulphur—if that is the name of the small town adjoining—was ever thought of these springs were visited by Indians and white men from all over that country, and that they had a great reputation in that part of the country.

The fact that the reservation or park may contain only six or eight hundred acres would seem to me to be not absolutely determinative of the merit of the appropriation. I know that in northern New York the region which contains all the variegated and most beneficial springs at Saratoga is an extremely limited area; but the medicinal value and the health-giving virtues of those springs and of that country are such that it is one of the most famous resorts in this country, and, I assume, has made as many cures in this country as the great spas of Germany have made abroad. Now, I understand that the Government, having made this area a public park, it has been devastated by some natural calamity—a flood, or something of that sort.

Mr. OWEN. A storm.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. A storm; and the matter of $10,000 is asked upon this bill to put it in the condition in which the Government had previously maintained it.

I am not speaking now of whether the Government ought to abandon it, ought to reverse its action in making it a park, or whether it ought to turn the park over to the State of Oklahoma or not. I have nothing to say about that. I do not know whether the amendment is in order on this bill or not under the technical rules of the Senate. If it is so that this is not a deficiency, and that nothing except a deficiency can go upon the deficiency bill, it may be so that the point of order would defeat this amendment.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have not made any point of order. I do not think it is open to a point of order. Whether it is a deficiency or not, if the Senate chooses to put it on, it has a right to do so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As far as that is concerned, then, it is not worth discussing, because, whether or not it is particularly germane to this bill, it is not subject to the point of order. If it does not go on this bill, the Senate could put it on some other bill, if it so chose. As I say, the Government has established this as a park, and has named it after one of its most distinguished public men, now dead. I take the word of the Senator from Oklahoma that it is of more than local benefit.

Mr. OWEN. It is.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And I can not see how the Government very well in honor can allow this park, which it now controls and owns and for which it has heretofore appropriated, to remain in a dismantled and damaged condition and just decline to appropriate the money to repair the damage. We are appropriating money to relieve the temporary distress of many people who are injured by fire and flood and cyclones in other parts of the country, where the Government has no interest at all except one of humanity; but if this is one of the Government's works, adopted by it, and an existing project, personally I should feel very, very sorry to see this appropriation defeated, especially as it has been recommended by the agents of the Government in whose charge it is.

What I have said I have said without any especial knowledge of the desirability of maintaining this park; but if its abandonment is going to be discussed I think the Government had better put it in as good condition as it was before the calamity occurred, before it insists upon the State of Oklahoma taking it off its hands, at least.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, it is true that the amendment is in order, because it is estimated by the department; but it is oftimes the duty, although it is sometimes disagreeable, for those who are handling the appropriation bills to ask the department to fall within the law and to withhold from urgent deficiency estimates such items as are not actual deficiencies under the law. Otherwise there is no uniform control over appropriations.

This is not a deficiency in any sense of the word. A deficiency bill is to provide for matters where the law has required certain action and expenditures and the funds are short within the current year to carry out the law. Of course there may occur inconveniences sometimes where we can not include items in the deficiency bill and expenditures have to wait a little; but these national-park matters are handled in the sundry civil bill, which is now being framed, where all of the parks are taken up together.

As to the park itself, I do not think it is necessary to go into that, except that, as I remember, as to this feature of sentiment, which I respect with others—no man has ever served in the Senate whom I respected more than Senator Platt, of Connecticut—as I understood him at the time, and I lived in the same house with him, his idea was that that park would be taken care of eventually, exactly as in some other States; that is to say, that when Oklahoma became a State they would ask that the Government give them the park for a State park.

We have a mile square State park in Wyoming. It was cut off from the corner of a great Indian reservation. It has fine hot springs, medicinal waters, and so forth. The State has taken it over, built up sanatoriums and hotels, and a splendid town has sprung up there of considerable importance. It is now a county seat.

That is a matter which, of course, does not come into the consideration of this amendment. I shall be glad to see the United States Government give and the State receive this park in any event, but I do think this amendment should await the consideration of the sundry civil bill, where all these park matters are taken care of.

I therefore hope that the amendment may not prevail.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. WARREN. I yield the floor.

Mr. GORE. I was intending to ask the Senator about the Yellowstone Park—whether that has been turned over to the State, or whether it ought to be turned over to the State?

Mr. WARREN. The Yellowstone Park, of course, is a park that the Senator in his wildest imagination would not compare with the Platt Park.

Mr. GORE. Certainly not.

Mr. WARREN. The State would be only too glad to take it; but the Government saw fit, before Wyoming was a State, to take possession of it. We are very glad to have the Government do so, very proud to have it there; but, of course, that is entirely another matter.

Mr. GORE. Of course, it is on a much larger scale; but does the Senator remember the amount——

Mr. WARREN. Let me say to the Senator that we are in exactly the same position. The roads leading in there have been washed out, and we have to appropriate for them, and there is no attempt made to get such an appropriation in on the deficiency bill. Perhaps the Senator did not understand that I make a distinction; I differentiate between a deficiency bill and the regular bills that provide for these parks.

Mr. GORE. Does the Senator think the pending bill is in a true sense a deficiency bill?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. GORE. Are there not a great many items in this bill that are in no sense deficiencies?

Mr. WARREN. I think not. What has the Senator in mind?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will say, if the Senator will permit me, that I do not think there is a single item in it that is not a deficiency.

Mr. WARREN. I do not think so, either.

Mr. GORE. Of course, that is largely a matter of definition; but, as I recall, there are items in this bill for naval expenditures and airships that were not provided for in any previous deficiency bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. They are deficiencies, every one of them.

Mr. GORE. As I understand, they are not shortages in some previous appropriation, but are new items. I gather that from a perusal of the bill.

Mr. WARREN. I do not so understand it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. They are all deficiencies.

Mr. GORE. Very well, Mr. President. That is a matter of definition, and the Senators can read the bill and reach their own conclusions about that point.

Touching the pending amendment, I can add very little to what has been said by my colleague and by other Senators. This national park can not be said to be the diamond of the desert, but it certainly can be characterized as the diamond of the prairies. It is situated in a vast, almost limitless, prairie and this area of forest primeval is a source of great charm. It has an attractive scenic situation in that prairie country. It would, of course, attract little attention in the wildernesses of Virginia, but in a prairie country like Oklahoma it has its charms for all lovers of nature.

The Senator from Virginia has suggested that it is a matter of no consequence. My colleague [Mr. OWEN] has responded to that proposition. The Senator from Virginia has reversed the relation of cause and effect. The city of Sulphur followed the establishment of the park. The park was not created on account of the existence of the town of Sulphur. Long before there was a city situated upon this site, people came from far and near to avail themselves of the medicinal waters of these springs. These waters enjoy a wide and famable reputation. Not only from Oklahoma, but from adjacent States, people have recourse to this resort in order to avail themselves of these curative waters.

There are 12 national parks. According to the report, during the last season the Platt National Park ranked third in the number of visitors. As I remember, there were 32,000 visitors to this park during the last season. That renders it third upon the list of national parks. If it be proposed to dismantle all these parks Oklahoma is courageous and she will abide her fate along with the other States, but why should Oklahoma be singled out as a victim for this policy of vandalism?

Mr. President, the reason for urging this upon the deficiency appropriation bill is this: Sulphur has grown up on account of the establishment of this park. It has grown to be a summer resort. This is a matter of great consequence to the city of course. On the 17th of January a storm of exceptional violence occurred in that section of Oklahoma. The waters rose some 18 feet, 9 feet higher than had ever been known in the memory of the oldest citizen. Houses were washed away, the sewerage system destroyed, and the park was left in a state of wreckage.

Now, a different situation prevails with reference to a summer resort from that which would apply to any other city. A summer resort losing one season may lose many seasons. It is a matter of very serious consequence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma will please suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 10385) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent that that bill be temporarily laid aside until we can finish the pending appropriation bill. This is the last item so far as I know that will have to be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the bill which has been under consideration be proceeded with. Is there objection?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I made the request, of course, with the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ASHURST. I, of course, have no objection. I understand it will not take over 10 minutes to finish the bill; but however long it may take I want it understood that the unfinished business is laid aside only for the purpose of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Oklahoma will proceed.

Mr. GORE. The reason for urging the adoption of this amendment is the fact that unless work is commenced now and completed before the opening of the season it will entail serious injury upon the town. I take it it is largely a matter of time as to whether this appropriation be made now or be made upon some subsequent bill. We would not urge it now if the consequences of delay would not be out of all proportion to the amount asked for by the amendment. It would be a great service to the city to have the appropriation made now, to have the improvements made now, to have the conditions which formerly existed restored. If the Government is to make an appropriation of $10,000 now or a few weeks later it can be a matter of no concern to the Government, but it is a matter of serious concern to the city and the people of the city who have invested their money, have built up a splendid little city there largely on account of the establishment of this national park. That is the existing condition.

Originally the park was established as a matter of sentiment. It was the desire of the Indians that at least this small portion of the great Indian empire should be preserved in its original state; and out of that vast empire this is the only section which is reserved to perpetuate those memories, to keep alive the traditions of the great tribes of Indians who have found their destiny in this section of Oklahoma. It was out of consideration of that sentiment that the park was established, and it was christened in honor of a former distinguished member of this body, one who had long manifested unfaltering interest in the welfare and in the fortunes of those tribes. This park stands as a monument to his memory, and I trust it will not be ruthlessly demolished by his successors in this Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. As he is not in the Chamber, I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote I should vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] and withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] and its transfer to the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH], I vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. I inquire whether he has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I withhold my vote.

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). Has the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I withhold my vote, having a pair with that Senator.

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). Has the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. WEEKS. I have a general pair with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CHILTON. I announce my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and transfer it to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. I vote "nay."

I desire to make the same announcement of the absence of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] that I made on the former vote. My colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. TILLMAN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. DU PONT. I observe that the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] is in the Chamber, with whom I have a general pair, and I vote "nay."

Mr. GRONNA (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. GRONNA. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], and let my vote stand.

Mr. TOWNSEND (after having voted in the negative). I voted with the understanding that the pair I have with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] was transferred to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], so that that allowed the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] and myself to vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and let my vote stand.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 23, as follows:

So Mr. OWEN's amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask that the unfinished business be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10385) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment is to insert the language on page 32, from line 4 to line 6 on page 33. The amendment has been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 9, under the head of "Minnesota," on page 33, line 14, after "$5,500," to strike out "in all, $61,675" and insert "to gravel and improve the road leading from the school buildings to the south line of the reservation, $1,000; to blast out and deepen the ditch and creek on said reservation, $2,000; in all, $64,675," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 9. For support and education of 225 Indian pupils at the Indian school, Pipestone, Minn., including pay of superintendent, $39,175; for general repairs and improvements and for remodeling building for dormitory purposes, $7,000; for mechanical and general utility shop building, $10,000; for septic tank, $5,500; to gravel and improve the road leading from the school buildings to the south line of the reservation, $1,000; to blast out and deepen the ditch and creek on said reservation, $2,000; in all, $64,675.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, line 7, after the word "act," to insert:

Provided, That not to exceed $60,000 of said amount and the one-fourth interest on the tribal funds of the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota now to their credit in the Treasury to be used for the maintenance of free schools shall be used for the compensation of employees in the Indian Service in Minnesota except for irregular laborers, and that the said Chippewas shall receive the preference in filling permanent positions in the service of the Chippewas of Minnesota where the compensation is paid from their tribal funds: Provided further, That not less than $10,000 of said amount of $185,000 may be used to furnish employment to the said Chippewas in building roads and making other improvements upon the Chippewa reservations in Minnesota for the benefit of the said Chippewas, and $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to establish an electric-light plant at the White Earth Agency, the boarding school there, and the village of White Earth, Minn., said plant or its proportionate share of expenses to be maintained by the residents of White Earth village under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

So as to make the clause read:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to withdraw from the Treasury of the United States, at his discretion, the sum of $185,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the principal sum on deposit to the credit of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota, arising under section 7 of the act of January 14, 1889, entitled "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota," and to use the same for the purpose of promoting civilization and self-support among the said Indians in manner and for purposes provided for in said act: Provided, That not to exceed $60,000 of said amount, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 35, after line 9, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to convey by patent in fee simple to independent school district No. 1, of Mahnomen County, Minn., for the purpose of a demonstration farm in connection with the agricultural department of the public schools of said place, that certain tract of land which has been set apart for the now abandoned Mahnomen Indian day school, said tract being described as follows, to wit: West half of the southwest quarter of section 11, township 144 north, range 42 west of the fifth principal meridian, in Minnesota: Provided, That the purchase price of the property conveyed, which shall be not less than its appraised value, shall be divided equally among those members of the Pembina Band of Indians living on the date of passage of this act who were born prior to July 21, 1900, but were not included on the allotment schedule approved on that date; appraisement of the property and payment of the proceeds to the said Indians to be under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe: Provided further, That this shall not be construed to affect any rights involved in pending litigation.

Mr. CURTIS. I notice from the proviso that there must be some litigation pending, and I am also advised that this property is claimed by an Indian as an allotment. I should like to have the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] or the chairman of the committee explain what the effect of the passage of this act will have in case there is an Indian claiming that allotment and what the litigation amounts to, if anything.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, there is a claim of allotment. I am not disposed to pass upon the merits of that claim, of course. I understood they had brought suit to test their rights, and, of course, the bill could not affect any rights where the suit was brought. Under the Federal statute a person who is eligible as an allottee, making application for a piece of land which is subject to allotment, can bring an action, and if he establishes those two facts he obtains a decree somewhat akin to our own decree of specific performance in equity. Of course, from the moment of making his application, nothing that can then be done can defeat the right, but in order to put it beyond any question and show that it was not intended that it should be hostile to the claim of the party in that litigation, this provision was inserted.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. GRONNA. As I understand it there is no adverse claim to the particular land described in the amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. As I understand it, an Indian claims it as an allotment and there is a suit pending to determine whether or not he has the right. Is it not unwise for Congress to provide for selling this property as long as that question of allotment has not been settled?

Mr. CLAPP. My answer to that would be that as I understand it, the litigation, that is, the trial, has already probably taken place. I would not be certain about that, but I think it was set for sometime in February. We interfere with no rights by this provision. If before the next session of Congress the courts have decided against the allotment and the time of appeal has expired, then without waiting further action of Congress this authorization would become operative. That is why it is asked for at this time. It can not, of course, affect any rights that are involved in the pending litigation, and while I do not care to express an opinion as to the litigation I desire to say that this absolutely safeguards it, and if in the interim the litigation is finally determined then the department will be at liberty to go on and make provision for this school.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I should like to recur, if it is not inconvenient to my colleague who has charge of the bill or to the Senate itself, to page 21, line 18, and to strike out the amendment which reads:

> For enlarging the irrigation system for the irrigation of Indian lands, for protective works to prevent damage to irrigable lands by floods, and for development of domestic water supply on the Papago Indian Reservation, in Arizona, in accordance with the plans and specifications submitted by the chief engineer of the Indian Service and approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, $70,000, to remain available until expended: Provided, That the cost of said project shall be reimbursed to the United States in accordance with such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

Mr. President, I move to strike out the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Arizona that the amendment has already been agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I understand not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the record.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Does the record show that it was agreed to?

Mr. ASHURST. It was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If that be true, as I was detained from the Chamber by sickness and could not possibly be here yesterday, I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which that was done. It is a matter of great importance to the city of Tucson.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator that the amendment as amended was agreed to. The amendment to the amendment struck out the last proviso, the reimbursable provision.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I should like to have it reconsidered, and I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona moves to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, to give the Senate an appreciable idea, there is all that is left of Arizona [exhibiting map showing reserved lands in Arizona]. The green and red and other colored matter show the reservations in my State. The reservation in question is this one here [indicating the Papago Reservation]. This reservation of 2,700,000 acres was made the other day for these very Papago Indians. It is suggested to me by a Senator near me that there are other sanctuaries for birds and animals that are not yet on the map. There is all that is left of the State for its support [indicating]. Look at it. Now, we are attempting by this amendment to take water from the city in which I live, that happens to lie between these two Indian reservations, by going above this point [indicating on the map], cut the river bed, and thus cut off the water from Tucson, a city of 20,000 people, and irrigate this tract of Indian reservation lands. This is Indian land painted in red on this map, and at a glance see what portion of our State is so dedicated.

Mr. GALLINGER. What are the other colors?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The others are the forest reserves and military reservations, and there are some yet to come. Where they are going to place them I do not know, unless they place them over the little-inhabited valleys which are left still unreserved and actually inhabited by home builders.

Mr. GALLINGER. You have enough left for some bird sanctuaries?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. One or two birds can find a home there probably when we carry out the promises of our platforms by opening lands to home seekers.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator what proportion of the State of Arizona is now reserved by the Government for different purposes?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. In round numbers half of it, and in the values of the land 90 per cent of it, and we are left to support a State on the treeless mountains and more forbidding deserts. You see the topographical condition of this country by this map. The unreserved lands are so valueless that even governmental greed would not consider them as an asset for posterity.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not as bad as in some of the other Western States.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If you make it any worse, you will soon find a larger emigration coming from there than you found going in in the last 20 years.

Now, the proposal is to tap this little river above the city of Tucson in order to irrigate that particular Indian reservation to which I have called your attention. I am convinced that the water to be developed by this amendment for use of the Indians has long since been appropriated by the city of Tucson and the irrigation project within that immediate vicinity. This amendment gives the right to the Indian Bureau to confiscate the property of the citizens of the State without even asking their leave in order to enrich the Indians at the expense of these home builders and prior appropriators of the full flow of that stream.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to his colleague?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. I differ with my colleague on any question with a great deal of deference because of his vast experience and knowledge of the situation. I should like to ask my distinguished colleague if he would not consent to an amendment of something like this import, after the last word, to add the following proviso:

> Provided, however, That no part of this appropriation shall be used, directly or indirectly, to interrupt, diminish, or interfere in any way or manner whatsoever with the flow of the water or waters that may be necessary now or hereafter to, or used now or hereafter by, the city of Tucson.

I think that amendment to the amendment would meet my colleague's objection.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I appreciate the suggestion of my colleague; but there is this difficulty surrounding it: We would be in court and become involved in litigation immediately. Going above this Indian reservation, tapping the underflow of that river, and bringing it up on the reservation we are immediately in a quandry as to how that affects the underflow of the water from which Tucson itself is supplied and how it affects the great irrigating works now supplying water for the cultivation of some ten or twelve thousand acres of land long since appropriated at millions of dollars of expense. These Indians have been on this reservation where the old San Xavier del Bac Mission stands probably ever since that mission was built, which was some 200 and odd years ago—it is probably nearly 300 years old now—and they are now in almost exactly the same condition as when first discovered, except that some of them have teams and are hauling some little wood between the reservation and the city. I gave a very unwilling consent, though I could not have helped it had I tried to do so, to this other reservation of some 2,000,000 acres being set aside for these same Indians, which was done only a few days ago. Almost one-tenth of this county was given to these Indians for the very purpose of relieving the situation at the San Xavier Reservation, as pathetically—almost tearfully—described by the Indian Commissioner or by some one designated by him to give light to the Committee on Indian Affairs while this amendment was under its consideration. The Indians are not without their usual supply of water, as I understand it, notwithstanding some would have us believe that all the water on that reservation would not equal the tears that have been lately shed concerning the awful condition of Poor Lo.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. With very great pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. When I voted to admit Arizona to statehood, I fully understood that there might be a scarcity of water in that State; but I never expected that there would be a scarcity of land.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator was quite correct about that until the Government got in its work on reservations.

Mr. GALLINGER. And it really is very surprising to me to learn that the Government has taken half of the territory of Arizona, and is now wanting to take more. I confess I very deeply sympathize with the Senator from Arizona in his contention that there ought to be some remedy.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I feel grateful for the sympathy of the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire, not for myself alone but for the people of the West, who still need his friendship and his great influence in their discouraging fight for justice.

Mr. GALLINGER. This same complaint comes from many other States. I think the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has said that a large proportion of the State of Utah has been confiscated, if I may use that term, in the same way; and that is the complaint of all the Western States. It seems to me—and I say it without meaning anything of a partisan nature—that the great party to which the Senator belongs might well, in its next national platform, declare in favor of restoring some of the land to the people of those States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It did so in the last Democratic national convention.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And I hope we shall do so in the next. We did, I think, in our last platform promise to restore much of these reserved lands.

Mr. GALLINGER. In rather a mild way.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes; in rather a mild way—a great deal too mild. But if we had kept that pledge, as mild as it seems, certain water-power bills and land-leasing bills would never have shown their faces in Congress, at least from this side of the Chamber.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. In just a minute I shall yield to the Senator.

Mr. President, I take pleasure at this point, as I have taken pleasure ever since I have been in public life, in paying what slight tribute I can, and I do it from my heart, to the broad generosity that the Senator from New Hampshire, who has just interrupted me, has shown in the fight which has been made by the Western States for a proper recognition by the Federal Government. I want that Senator to feel that when he shall have quit the busy scenes of this life, when he shall be known no longer among us here, there will be grateful hearts everywhere in the West for his services to them, and that those people will pay a tribute of their intense admiration, aye, of their affection for the honored Senator, who never once in all our struggles has abandoned our cause, but who has stood alone, among all other New England Senators, in advocacy of justice to the people of the Western States. I am glad to see that his sympathy is still with us; and if we could only get the same spirit into the hearts of other Senators, who know so much less about these conditions than do we and than does the Senator from New Hampshire, we should have very little difficulty in relieving ourselves of many of the burdens with which we are now oppressed.

I now yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I was merely going to remark to the Senator from Arizona that I feared he was unduly alarmed, and that if the usual luck which attends the Indians still stays with them the whites will soon get all this land back. As soon as it becomes valuable the whites will get it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I am not surprised at that statement from the Senator from Oregon; but I should like to put in contrast with that statement the broader one of the Senator from New Hampshire, to whom I have just alluded. It is very easy for us to go upon a reservation, to see a lazy, naked Indian wanting something to eat, and to come back and say that he must be given something to eat, no matter how naked or how poor are the American people who must pay for his rations. I can pick a hundred places in the poor mountain districts of the Eastern States where the lot of an equal number of poor white people are in an infinitely worse condition than the Indians on any western reservation known to me. The misery of poverty is comparative at last. There is not an Indian community to-day, despite all the statements being made by eastern men, which is not better off than the poorer classes in the East, and many of them are the richest people in the world. There is not an Indian reservation in the United States under the care of this Government where the Indians are not in an infinitely better condition than are the same number of white people that I might point out all over the Eastern States of the country. Tucson is the town in which I live. I know that reservation as well as I know the boundaries of this room.

Mr. CLAPP. How far from the city of Tucson is this proposed irrigation project?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator will pardon me if I have to explain somewhat in answering him.

Mr. CLAPP. That is just what I want.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Indian reservation lies above two approaching points of a mountain range on each side that holds the Santa Cruz River, and it empties itself into the lower valley between these two mountain points. On the river above the reservation a somewhat similar condition exists. Just above the city of Tucson an irrigation company dug enormous ditches across the valley, about which I have told the Senate, and put in, I do not know how many, pumps to raise the water. When I saw them in operation I think there were 10 or 12 reservoirs emptying into the pumping stations from which the water recovered from the sands was being used for farming purposes. Even the water for the city itself is pumped through the sand at a point some distance from the river bed, and by going above these works, where this amendment proposes to go, will tap the underflow of the city supply. There is no other water available. If they go above and cut this water off and begin to irrigate this reservation, then the irrigation works below are gone and the water supply of the city itself is threatened.

Mr. CLAPP. It is not, then, planned to build a diversion dam?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No.

Mr. CLAPP. Is it the plan to build a reservoir?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No. This is down in southern Arizona, at a point which I indicate here [indicating on the map]. The little Santa Cruz River runs in this direction [indicating]; here is where I live. The reservation is here [indicating], and they expect to tap the river which flows from that point into the city of Tucson. It can hardly be called a river; it is a small creek, and in the summer time there is nothing in it much except sand.

Mr. CLAPP. How far is the proposed dam or the point where the water is tapped for the city of Tucson?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. There is no dam. The first supply of the city of Tucson, I should judge, would be about only a mile or so from the distributing pipe.

Mr. President, this matter should be investigated before intemperate action is taken. I will state to the Senate that I could not get home during the last session on account of the sickness of my brother at my old home in Kentucky, though, had I been able to go home, I had this particular matter in view. I expect to be in Arizona during the coming summer, however, and I want an opportunity to give this matter personal investigation again, to study the purposes and the plans, and to ascertain whether or not it is going to involve the ruin of the people below, and, therefore, I do not want the Senate, if I can help it, to adopt the amendment now.

I have no desire to cut off anything from the Indians. The Lord knows I have more sympathy for them than people who never saw them and never lived within a hundred or a thousand miles of them.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator has been speaking of the amount of land in the State of Arizona withdrawn from entry under the guise of forest reserves and Indian reservations. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] suggested that there ought to be some declaration in the Democratic platform with relation to the matter. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Arizona, and also of the Senator from New Hampshire, to the clause in the Democratic platform on this subject, and I will also refer to the Republican platform upon the same question.

The public domain should be administered and disposed of—

It will be noticed that the words used are "disposed of"; there is no leasing proposition in it—

The public domain should be administered and disposed of with due regard to the general welfare. Reservations should be limited to the purposes which they purport to serve and not extended to include land wholly unsuited therefor. The unnecessary withdrawal from sale and settlement of enormous tracts of public land, upon which tree growth never existed and can not be promoted, tends only to retard development, create discontent, and bring reproach upon the policy of conservation.

The public-land laws should be administered in a spirit of the broadest liberality toward the settler exhibiting a bona fide purpose to comply therewith, to the end that the invitation of this Government to the landless should be as attractive as possible; and the plain provisions of the forest-reserve act permitting homestead entries to be made within the national forest should not be nullified by administrative regulations which amount to a withdrawal of great areas of the same from settlement.

Mr. President, that was the declaration of the Democratic national platform.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question. The platform does not say whether the public domain should be disposed of permanently or temporarily, does it?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, "disposed of" means, I presume, parting with title. Whenever a person attempts to dispose of something he is trying to get rid of it; but leasing is the most permanent form of holding that can be conceived of.

Mr. MYERS. I will ask the Senator if leasing land for 50 years is not a disposition of it for a good while?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no.

Mr. MYERS. I understand the Supreme Court of the United States has said that leasing land for five years is disposing of it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; the court said it was not disposing of it, but nevertheless——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I must resume the floor. I do not want to become involved in an outside discussion on a matter that is not pertinent to the subject immediately under discussion. The Senators will have time later to debate the question which has been precipitated, but I would rather get through with what I have begun, if I can.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I merely want to read to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] the provision of the Republican platform on the same matter.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. He knows it by heart already.

Mr. SHAFROTH. He does not know that clause of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Arizona declines to yield further.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No; I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Here is the plank in the Republican national platform in regard to Government reserves:

We favor such fair and reasonable rules and regulations as will not discourage or interfere with actual bona fide homeseekers, prospectors, and miners in the acquisition of public lands under existing laws.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If you get a year's lease, that is an acquisition according to some of the arguments lately made on this floor.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It seems to me that where both of the political parties have referred to the disposal of the public lands in such a way, there ought not to be any division of sentiment in regard to a leasing bill.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado if he thinks the Democratic administration has lived up to that platform?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I will answer that question myself. I refuse to yield further. I will say that neither Republican nor Democratic administrations have lived up to the doctrine stated. The Republican administration got as bad as it could get, and ours has not made half the improvement in regard to this question that it should have made.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator point out any improvement that has been made by the Democratic Party since it came into power.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes; there has been some improvement. For instance, in several of the States the size of a number of reservations has been cut down, but not half enough, I admit.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I absolutely refuse to yield further. Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate unduly. This interesting argument can come up after we dispose of my motion to strike out the amendment. I plead with Senators to let that question be disposed of, and disposed of favorably to my contention, before we get into any further argument on a collateral question.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, when this matter was up yesterday I said to the Senate, on the authority of the Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that this amendment applied to 700 Indians and a reservation of 69,000 acres. In the report of the hearings before the House committee, on page 173, the assistant commissioner says:

There are about 700 Indians on this reservation.

He further says:

This appropriation will be used for the benefit of the Indians only. We have a reservation covering an area of 69,000 acres.

On page 175 Mr. Meritt says:

"Mr. Chairman, the important point in connection with this appropriation is that if we do not get appropriations this year those Indians may lose their opportunity to irrigate that land, because the water may be taken by this development company."

It seems to me that if those Indians can be assisted by an appropriation of $70,000 and each be given 10 acres of land to irrigate and farm, it will be a good investment.

I join with the Senator from Arizona in the regret that the Government has taken away so much of the land in Arizona and is not disposing of it; but it does seem to me that that does not justify Congress in refusing to appropriate the money to provide irrigation for these Indians, the opportunity for which otherwise may be lost to them, although the water may not go to the settlers nor to the town, but to an irrigation company.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. To what company does the Senator refer?

Mr. CURTIS. I am only reading from what the commissioner has said. I have no personal knowledge at all of the matter.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Neither has the commissioner, I am afraid.

Mr. CURTIS. The name is not given here on this page and I will not take the time to find the name, but the commissioner said:

If we do not get appropriations this year those Indians may lose their opportunity to irrigate that land, because the water may be taken by this development company.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will permit me an interruption, I shall not detain him long.

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator cites an authority who does not even know what company he is talking about and does not say where the company is located and whether above or below. I will tell the Senator what the assistant commissioner is referring to. He is referring to the same company to which I alluded in opening my remarks, which made an appropriation of water years ago; which made a filing on water that was not known to exist. They made it by cutting the valley from hillside to hillside, raising the water in deep cuts, and pumping it on the land at an enormous expenditure. That was the one and the full appropriation made years and years ago, and certainly neither the Senator nor anyone else would think for a moment of taking away appropriated water and giving it to the Indians merely because they happen to need it.

Mr. CURTIS. I said I had not had time to read the hearings to find the name of the company, but only read the statement that this company would appropriate the water. No. doubt the name of the company is given, because it is referred to as "the company heretofore mentioned."

I believe the Indians there are just as much entitled to water for irrigation purposes as are the settlers. They have been there for a long time and they are entitled to the water. There is nothing before the Senate to show that if $70,000 is used to put in wells or a dam or other works to control the underflow, or apart of it, that anyone will be deprived of it. If the underflow in that section is—and I understand it is—like the underflow of other sections of the United States, you can not exhaust it by an appropriation of $70,000 or even $70,000,000. There is a river underneath, and there is plenty of water not only to supply the Indians but also the settlers and the city to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, will the Senator excuse me for a brief interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Does not the Senator concede that geological conditions might have something to do with that matter?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; but——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have not finished my question, and I am sure the Senator and I do not want to have any disagreement as to the facts.

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly not.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Or to get excited about it.

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly not.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am more apt to become excited, because of my disposition, than is the Senator from Kansas.

I have tried to explain that all of the water of the San Pedro River, or the Santa Cruz, as this little stream is called, passes between two points of the mountain that holds the whole watershed of the Santa Cruz River. It can find no other escape except under the bed of this river through the contracting gorge made by the approaching mountains from either side of it. Now, all the water has to come through that particular channel, no matter how deep its underflow, or else its underflow is so extremely deep that nobody could ever afford to go hunting for it. So, you see, it amounts, at least, to damming the river above the city.

Mr. CURTIS. I have studied the underflow of Arizona somewhat, and I find that, while it is sometimes true that the flow disappears in the bed of a river, it returns again at some other place. At some points by digging wells you find it at 75 feet, at others at 300 feet, and then a few miles beyond it comes back to the surface. I venture to say that the underflow there is not limited to the bed of the stream, or beneath the bed of the stream, but flows out over that entire valley and can be tapped anywhere in the valley. I am sustained in making that statement by the fact that wells have been put down on this reservation and water has been found in various places. There are now several hundred wells being operated upon that reservation, and I think it is only fair and just to the Indians that we give the department the $70,000 to protect their right to the water and prevent it from going to an independent company.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. CURTIS. I am perfectly willing, if the senior Senator from Arizona will accept the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Arizona, to consent to such an amendment, because I believe there is plenty of water for them all. I now yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. I was about to ask the Senator from Kansas what right the Indians have in the stream?

Mr. CURTIS. The Indians have no greater right than anyone else, but the Indians have been living there for many, many years; they have been appropriating what little water they needed, and now that the Government is trying to make farmers out of them they need more water, and they can not get it unless this appropriation is made.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And it has got to take it from somebody who has already appropriated it.

Mr. WORKS. What I am trying to arrive at is, whether the Indians really have any right to the water there that could be utilized if the expenditure were made. I do not know.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the report of the engineers is that they can utilize it. If they can not, then undoubtedly the Government will not use the money.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator has either not understood me or has not answered my question. There may be other claims to the water; there may have been previous appropriations, as the Senator knows. What I am trying to arrive at is, what is the right under the law that the Indians may have to use the water? I have not seen anywhere any of the inexhaustible underflow of streams of which the Senator has been speaking. I wish we could find some of them.

Mr. CURTIS. I have studied the underflows and I have found a good many of them, and if the Senator will examine the reports of the Geological Survey he will find them. I have gone over large sections of the country, two or three hundred miles, and found that some underflow could be located in some places at 20 feet and at some places from 69 to 100 feet; but, nevertheless, it was the same underflow.

Mr. WORKS. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. CURTIS. I think in Arizona the reports of the Geological Survey show that you may find the underflow at some places, as I have suggested, at 60 feet and at some places at 300 feet.

Before the Senator from California leaves the Chamber, I want to say that all I based my statements on in reference to the contest of rights was what is stated by the Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who says:

> The important point in connection with this appropriation is that if we do not get appropriations this year those Indians may lose their opportunity to irrigate that land, because the water may be taken by this development company.

That would indicate that it had not yet been taken.

Mr. WORKS. I was not undertaking to antagonize the position taken by the Senator from Kansas. I was trying to arrive at the facts, if I could, of what were the rights there.

Mr. CURTIS. I really do not know, and so I can not give the Senator the information; but if there are existing rights, no law we could pass would take those rights away.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I think the white settlers have a right to all the water that they need, and I will go as far as the Senator from Arizona will to procure it for them. At the same time I believe—I do not know whether the Senator will agree with me or not—that there is plenty of water there for all if it is apportioned properly and proper measures are taken to secure and conserve it; but I do not think that will ever be secured by any system of pumping, which is always expensive and precarious. If the Senator will come in here asking for an appropriation to go back into the mountains and dam the "arroyos," as they call them there, or the gulches or the ravines, as you like, and dam them all, both great and small, at intervals, at their heads, to hold the water, and hold it as it falls in the great rainstorms they have there, or from the snow when it melts, instead of letting it race away or sink into the ground, as it does in that section of the country, as it does in New Mexico, as it does in Nevada, and as it does in many portions of the western country, they will not have to pump water, but it will come over the top of the ground, it will irrigate that whole country, and it will become a garden spot of incalculable value. No man knows better than I do what water will do under the climate of Arizona. From a desert it will be turned into a veritable Garden of Eden and the lands become among the most valuable in America. That is the proper way to handle the proposition and to take care of the interests of Tucson, of the white settlers, and of the Indians alike. But the Indian has his rights, and I do not think the Senator is trying to deprive him of them. Naturally, however, he is jealous of the rights of his fellow citizens. I do not blame him for that. I do not criticize him. I do not want to put a straw in the way of his obtaining them; but this method will not do it. It is a case of one interest combating another, with the Indians in the long run, as the Senator must know, being deprived of their land. It was all their country at one time, and they have a right to live and exist, and I think fair treatment is due them.

I do not wish to give the Indians any rights which would imperil those of their white neighbors, but I would like to see them get what is justly due them. If the Senator can assure this body that they will be cared for in the future, I am quite willing to go with him just as far as he himself goes; otherwise not.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, only a word in answer. I do not think even the tender heart of my friend the Senator from Oregon feels for the oppressed any more than I do, whether it be an Indian or a white man. This company, of which the Senator from Kansas spoke, at an enormous expense developed the water and all the water that flows through the buttes of the Santa Cruz River long before the question was raised about the Indians taking any of it above the point of its appropriation. That land has been disposed of to farmers and poor people in tracts of 10 acres up, and they are living on this water so pumped at enormous expense.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. My colleague, of course, expects soon to go to the State of Arizona, for various reasons, as I do. He lives at the city of Tucson. I think, upon the whole, that we should reject the amendment now under consideration, in view of his statements. He is more familiar with the facts—and I say it with all respect—than the department itself.

As far as I can do so on behalf of the committee, let the amendment be rejected; and then, when the next bill comes in for the next year, he will be here with first-hand knowledge, able to give us the details, although he has given a very remarkable statement of facts to-day, and I have no doubt accurate facts.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I shall be very glad to give the Indians what they are entitled to.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not want to press an amendment against any Senator, much less against my colleague, when it affects a situation in his town, where he knows and ought to know more about it than any other Senator, and more about it than the department.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do know more about it than the department, if the hearings disclose the full sum of their knowledge.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I certainly do not want to take any position here that is unfriendly to Arizona, or that the Senator from Arizona thinks is wrong; but I wish we were not compelled to kill an amendment which the Commissioner of Indian Affairs says is absolutely essential to the rights of the Indians, because if it is not done at this time he fears that within the next year it will be placed beyond our power to take care of the Indians.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will assure the Senator that there is nothing in that, I do not care who states it, for the appropriation of water he is speaking of is below the point where the Indians reside on the stream.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PAGE. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. In reply to the distinguished Senator from Vermont, I want to say this—and I say it with much respect—with regard to the commissioner and the assistant commissioner: They have shown a great familiarity with these 167 to 168 reservations; but in all candor, does the Senator believe that the department can know more about this question than my colleague, who lives there, and has lived there for thirty-odd years? Does the Senator think that anybody in the United States who never has been in Hyde Park but once or twice knows more about Hyde Park than the junior Senator from Vermont? I think the junior Senator from Vermont knows more about his own home town than people who do not live there; and I do think we should reject the amendment, so that my colleague can have an opportunity to investigate the facts and come before the committee next year with all the facts and fresh information. That is the reason why I am going to vote against the amendment.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of our committee if he believes with the commissioner that the adoption of this amendment at this time is absolutely vital to the rights of the Indians?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I say, as far as I am concerned, residing there, that I know it is not. I do not think anything about it.

Mr. ASHURST. For myself, not living in Tucson, although going there very frequently, I think that no man in Arizona knows more about Tucson than my colleague.

Mr. PAGE. I agree with that.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish I knew as much about it as he does.

Mr. PAGE. What I desired to do, if possible, was to have the amendment passed over, with the hope that the department might suggest some way in which we might protect the rights of the Indians and at the same time get along with the rights of the whites there, to which the Senator refers.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have to leave the city on account of illness, and I am extremely anxious that this amendment should be disposed of before I leave.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. PAGE. Just one moment, and I will yield the floor. I want to say here that I am not disposed to press the matter against the views of the Senator from Arizona. If he says he knows that the Indians' rights will not be disturbed or imperiled, I am, of course, going to believe what he says absolutely, and I shall not vote against his motion.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I say that I am convinced, knowing that condition, as much as a man possibly can be. I do not want to have the statement go out that I say I am beyond any possible mistake of judgment; but I am speaking with all sincerity to the Senator when I say that I do not believe that the fact of rejecting this amendment now will affect one particle the ultimate rights of the Indians to any water that is above this point of irrigation; for whatever the people below there have they have gotten by actual appropriation. I do not see how it can possibly hurt the Indian, in the water that has to pass him before it gets to this point, to wait until I can come before the next committee, where I hope to be able to give an absolute demonstration of the matter. If I find it possible to help these Indians, with a due regard to the water already appropriated and in use by white people, who need it just as badly and have the unquestioned title to it, I shall be very glad to present it to the committee, for I have no desire on earth to injure the Indians.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not wish to be understood as opposing the rejection of this amendment, if that is the request of both of the Senators from Arizona; but I do feel that I ought to make a statement in order to justify the action of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

It was stated to the committee that the Papago Indians were sorely in need of water—so much so that the cattle belonging to these Indians were dying for want of water. That statement and those telegrams will be found in the RECORD. I simply want to say, in justification of the action of the committee, that it was with the very best motives that the committee acted to give to these Indians water which they certainly need, according to the statements made to the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 36, after line 6, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue to the Northern Minnesota Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church a patent in fee for 40 acres of land on the Nett Lake Indian Reservation in Minnesota, described as follows: South half of northeast quarter of lot 1; north half of southeast quarter of lot 1; south half of north half of northeast quarter of lot 1; north half of south half of southeast quarter of lot 1; south half of northeast quarter of northwest quarter; and south half of south half of north half of northeast quarter of northwest quarter, all in section 19, township 65 north, range 21 west of the fourth principal meridian containing 40 acres more or less; such patent to be in lieu of that authorized and directed in the act of August 1, 1914 (38 Stat. L., p. 591).

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, when this item was before the committee there was a question raised about the description. I want to ask the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], who offered the amendment, as I understand, whether or not the description contained in this amendment is the correct one?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes. Upon examination the Indian Office found this was the correct description and approved it. There was at one time in the hearings some question as to the description, but subsequently it was settled.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, and the Secretary read the following paragraph, ending on page 37, line 18:

That the Secretary of the Interior, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, is hereby authorized to advance to any individual Chippewa Indian in the State of Minnesota entitled to participate in the permanent fund of the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota one-fourth of the amount which would now be coming to said Indian under a pro rata distribution of said permanent fund: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, may use for or advance to any Chippewa Indian in the State of Minnesota entitled to share in said fund who is incompetent, blind, crippled, decrepit, or helpless from old age, disease, or accident, one-fourth of the amount which would now be coming to said Indian under a pro rata distribution of said permanent fund: Provided further, That any money received hereunder by any member of said tribe or used for his or her benefit shall be deducted from the share of said member in the permanent fund of the said Chippewa Indians in Minnesota to which he or she would be entitled: Provided further, That the funds hereunder to be paid to Indians shall not be subject to any lien or claim of attorneys or other third parties.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I understand there is objection to the distribution of this per capita payment. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] is so well informed that I wish he would give us some information about it. Of course, the language is just as it came from the House, but I have not the information that I should like to have concerning this matter.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I do not know exactly the objection to which the Senator refers. When this bill came over there was objection to the language of the House, because at one time in the genesis of the measure in the House a provision was inserted that no part of this fund that is to be distributed should be applied in payment of any debt contracted prior to the passage of the act. The Indian Office, when their attention was called to it, of course recognized that that was an inadvertence. They did not want to teach the Indians dishonesty and prohibit them from paying any debts they might have fairly contracted, and before the bill finally left the House that provision was changed, so that it now reads:

Provided further, That the funds hereunder to be paid to Indians shall not be subject to any lien or claim of attorneys or other third parties.

It exempts them from the lien if the Indian seeks to exempt them, but does not prohibit the Indian from paying a debt that he recognizes.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that the information I have is to the effect that some 86 Indians were suspended from the rolls there. Of course they object to this money being paid out, because they do not have the opportunity of participating in it. They will not get their share.

Mr. CLAPP. But the order suspending those Indians has been reversed. It was made a year or two ago; but the department has recently held that it had no authority to suspend them, and they are now restored. That is, they never were taken off, but the suspension is abandoned.

Mr. GRONNA. I understand, then, from the Senator's statement that they will all participate in this distribution of funds?

Mr. CLAPP. There is no question but that the fact of that suspension will not interfere with their right to participate. All the Indians upon the rolls will be entitled to this participation.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 37, after line 18, to insert:

The superintendent of logging upon the Chippewa Reservations in Minnesota is hereby authorized to expend not to exceed $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, from the amount derived from the sale of the pine timber of the Chippewas of Minnesota, in the payment of scalers, check scalers, as provided by the act of January 14, 1889 (25 Stat. L., 642), and such clerks as he may employ. Any act not in conformity with this provision is hereby repealed. A detailed statement of all the expenses hereinafter incurred and paid from the tribal funds of the Chippewas of Minnesota shall be reported to Congress annually.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, after line 5, to strike out:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause an examination to be made by experts of the Geological Survey of the ceded lands, for which the United States has not conveyed title, in the State of Minnesota, embraced within the provisions of an act entitled, "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota," approved January 14, 1889 (25 Stat. L., 642), and if there be found any lands bearing valuable deposits of iron ore or other valuable minerals, the said Secretary is hereby authorized to reserve, for the use and benefit of the Chippewa Indians in Minnesota, the minerals and the mineral rights pertaining to any of the such lands; and the said Secretary is hereby authorized to withdraw from the Treasury $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the principal sum on deposit to the credit of the Chippewa Indians in Minnesota in order to make the geological examination herein provided for.

And to insert:

Hereafter on ceded lands in the State of Minnesota embraced within the provisions of the law entitled "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota," approved January 14, 1889, the minerals in and mineral rights pertaining to any of the lands the cession of which was provided for in said act, and for which the United States has not conveyed title, shall be and remain in and are reserved for the use and benefit of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 39, after line 10, to insert:

That the sum of $6,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the tribal funds of the Chippewa Indians of the State of Minnesota, is hereby appropriated to pay the expenses of the general council of said tribe to be held at Bemidji, Minn., beginning on the second Tuesday of July, 1916, pursuant to the constitution of the general council of said Chippewa Indians of Minnesota, organized in May, 1913, and to pay the actual and necessary expenses of the delegates who attended the meeting of said general council, commencing June 12 and ending June 14, 1915, at White Earth, Minn., and at Detroit, Minn., October 4, 1915, and also the necessary expenses of the members of the executive committee of said council when attending to the business of the tribe, and to pay the expenses to Washington, in January and February, 1915, and in January, February, and March, 1916, of the delegations of the Chippewa Indians of the State of Minnesota, appointed by the president of said general council pursuant to the resolutions of said general councils of August 14, 1914, and June 14, 1915, to present the affairs of said Indians of the State of Minnesota to the officials of the United States; said $6,000 to be immediately available, and the expenses of said delegation to be paid by the Secretary of the Interior upon itemized accounts approved by the president of the executive committee of said council and certified to by the secretary of the council. The Secretary of the Interior may authorize an inspector, or special agent, or Indian superintendent, to attend future sessions of said general council and conventions to which delegates therefor are elected.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I make the point of order against that amendment.

Mr. CLAPP. I hope the Senator will not make the point of order.

Mr. CURTIS. I make it on two grounds: First, that it is a claim; second, that it is general legislation disposing of Indian funds—not Government funds, but Indian funds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. CLAPP. I do.

I do not think the last point of order is applicable. The Chair ruled yesterday, when the Vice President was occupying the chair, that an amendment limited to any one tribe or any one person was not general legislation; nor do I think it is subject to the other point, because I can not but think it is in harmony with the spirit of carrying out the treaty of 1889, providing for the civilization and development of the Chippewas in Minnesota.

I want to say in that connection, Mr. President, that I do not believe any fund is used to better advantage than that which is devoted to education; and certainly the practical phase of education is as important as that contained within the school. This develops among these people the capacity for conducting their general business and discussing their questions of interest, and in this very bill there is evidence of the value of its existence. In the general appropriation of the Chippewa funds there are limitations provided as to the manner in which they shall be used, which proceeded from a suggestion of this council; and on page 37 there is a limitation as to the use of the funds derived from the sale of timber by the superintendent of logging on the reservation, and a requirement of an annual detailed full statement of expenses.

I regret very much that the Senator presses his point. Of course I may say, in passing, that among these Indians, like all other Indians, and among the white men, there are always factions; there is more or less friction; there is more or less difference of opinion. But it is out of that friction and difference of opinion that the white man has largely progressed and developed, and I do not think it is lamentable or to be regretted that there are these divisions of sentiment and factions and interests among the Indians.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, there are three distinct claims presented in this amendment—one to pay the expenses to be incurred this coming July, one to pay the expenses incurred in May, 1913, and another to pay the expenses of a delegation to Washington, and therefore this amendment is subject to a point of order. It is also subject to a point of order because it is general legislation, in that we are taking the money of an Indian tribe that is in the Treasury of the United States and making a disposition of it by legislation in this bill. That makes it general legislation.

The Vice President did hold on yesterday on an irrigation project that because it applied to one tribe it was not subject to a point of order; but I called the Vice President's attention this morning to a ruling made within a year where he sustained a point of order on the very same item, and, no doubt, he was mistaken yesterday and was right a year ago. That, however, does not apply to this case, in my judgment, first, because this is clearly a claim, and, second, because we are appropriating money out of the tribal funds. It is not Government money. We are taking it out of the funds of the tribe, and it can only be done by legislation, and we change a law that provides how that money shall be distributed.

I want to say, on the general question, that there is a division. The full-blood faction of this tribe is opposed to the use of this money. I believe in standing by the full bloods whenever it is possible to do so, and I believe the delegation of full bloods know about what the full-blood members of the tribe want.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, so far as appropriating this money is concerned, all of the original appropriation beginning on page 33, except the one-fourth of interest, which is provided for by the general law, is an appropriation out of their funds. If that rule were to be sustained we could make no appropriation from the general fund; but year after year and in this very bill this $185,000 is appropriated out of the general fund, and it is a mere question of the form of the appropriation, whether it should be in the larger item or in this separate item. The law contemplates that a certain amount of this money shall be used for their civilization and advancement.

As to the item for next June, we are simply following in this respect the provision of the bill of last year which failed, and the failure of which made necessary the provision in this item with reference to the 1913 meeting of the council. I sincerely hope the Senator will not press his point of order. I believe this is a good thing. I have always felt that it would be better if more Indians were brought here to Washington during the session of Congress. Sometimes they have views which are not in strict harmony with what would be considered as practical; again, they present practical views. They are able to go back to their people and discuss these things; and I think instead of discouraging we ought to encourage the coming of Indian delegations to Washington, especially during the session of Congress, during the development of the legislation upon this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A portion of this amendment seems to relate to authorizing expenditures for obligations already incurred. Another portion of it relates to authorizing expenditures for prospective obligations. The Chair does not think the authorization of expenditures for an obligation not already incurred would constitute a claim. In view of the circumstances, the Chair will submit the point of order to the Senate.

The question is, Is the amendment in order? [Putting the question.] By the sound, the "ayes" seem to have it.

Mr. CURTIS. I call for a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As many as believe that the amendment is in order will rise. [A pause.] As many as believe the amendment is not in order will rise. [A pause.] The amendment is rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 41, after line 4, to insert:

For the tuition, board, books and paper, and traveling expenses to and from their respective homes of two Chippewa boys for the school year ending June 10, 1915, $1,500; and for five Chippewa boys for the school year ending June 10, 1916, $3,250, at Keewaton Academy, Wisconsin, incurred under the authority of the general council of the Minnesota Chippewas, said amounts to be paid upon vouchers being submitted to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and approved by the board of Indian education of the said general council: Provided, That the said payments shall be made from the tribal funds of the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota in the Treasury of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, after line 17, to insert:

That the sixth paragraph of section 9 of the act approved June 30, 1913 (38 Stat. L., p. 89), be, and the same hereby is, amended by striking out the words "one of whom shall be selected by the Department of Justice," in the third line thereof, and substituting therefor the words "one of whom shall be an assistant to the Attorney General, and who shall continue as such commissioner during the pleasure and under the direction of the Attorney General."

That the seventh paragraph of section 9 of the act approved June 30, 1913 (38 Stat. L., p. 89), be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows: "That the roll herein provided for shall be made in triplicate and shall show the allotment number or numbers, together with the description of the property allotted, and the name, age, sex, and whether the allottee is of full Indian blood or a mixed blood. The roll shall also state whether the person named is living or dead, and if dead, the approximate date of death shall be stated, when it can be ascertained, together with the age of such person at death as near as practicable. No allotment nor allottee thereof shall be enrolled where there is a suit now pending, or hereafter commenced, prior to the completion of such roll, to cancel any conveyance of such allotment, until such suit has been finally determined."

That the unexpended balance of the appropriation for carrying into effect the provisions of the act of June 30, 1913, making appropriations for current and contingent expenses of the Indian Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914 (38 Stat. L., p. 89), creating a commission to prepare a roll of the allottees within the White Earth Reservation, in the State of Minnesota, and defining the duties of such commission, is hereby reappropriated and made immediately available for the payment of expenses incurred and salaries earned by the said commissioners, or under their direction, in carrying out the provisions of said act since June 30, 1914, and for the purpose of continuing the work of such commission under said act.

That for the completion of the enrollment of the allottees within the White Earth Reservation, in the State of Minnesota, required by the act of June 30, 1913, as amended by this Act, there is hereby appropriated the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for that purpose. This appropriation shall continue available until expended or the work of the said commission shall have been completed.

Before the reading of the amendment was concluded,

Mr. CURTIS. It is all one amendment, commencing at page 41, line 18, and ending at page 43, line 16.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the reading be finished.

After the reading of the amendment had been concluded,

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I make the point of order on that amendment that it is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I wish to be heard on the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What is the act of June 30, 1913?

Mr. CLAPP. That is the act which provided for the creation of a commission to consist of two persons, to be approved by the judge of the United States district court for the district of Minnesota, one to be a citizen of the State and the other to be designated by the Department of the Interior. The first change is to change that method of selecting and provide that one of the two shall be an assistant to the Attorney General. I may say in passing that the Attorney General advises that he should be selected from among the special assistants to the Attorney General.

Then the act provided that they should make a roll, the roll to be submitted to the court and to become effective only when approved by the court. It provided that in making the roll the commissioners should determine the quantum of Indian blood, one of the courts having at that time held that an Indian was not of mixed blood unless he had at least one-eighth Indian blood. Hence it was important that the roll should show the quantum.

Since then the Supreme Court of the United States has reversed that position and holds that it is immaterial what the quantum of blood is. As a great deal of the work devolving on the commission would be the ascertainment of the quantum, a much more difficult proposition than the mere ascertainment of whether there is any mixed blood or not, it was thought that it would very much lessen the work and, as the quantum no longer served any purpose, leave the law just as effective to strike out the requirement of the quantum, leaving it only necessary to show that the party is of mixed blood or of full blood, as the case may be.

Then, owing to the failure of the Indian appropriation bill last year, of course, the appropriation that had theretofore been made failed and left the commission without sufficient funds. I think it is also suggested that an amount in addition to the original appropriation would be required.

That, briefly, is the situation. It is simply carrying out existing law, and the only change that is made is not general legislation, but simply affects the particular act.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the item clearly amends a general act of Congress. It can not amend——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let us find out right at this point whether the act applies to the Indians in general?

Mr. CLAPP. No, sir; it does not.

Mr. CURTIS. It applied to each member of the tribe. It provided for the enrollment of the members of the tribe. It provided for the settlement of the questions of the right to be enrolled. It also settled the question of quantum of Indian blood, and it provided that selections or allotments should be made to all the members who were found entitled to be enrolled.

This act changes that by turning the first duty over to an assistant attorney general, which is an amendment, not very material but, nevertheless, an amendment. The next change is that the old law provided for the finding of the quantum of Indian blood, while this amendment simply says the commission shall determine whether the Indian is of full blood or mixed blood. There is a good deal of difference between finding whether an Indian is part blood or full blood and finding the quantum of Indian blood.

Again, the latter part of the amendment, on page 42, reads:

No allotment nor allottee thereof shall be enrolled where there is a suit now pending, or hereafter commenced, prior to the completion of such roll.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon me, that was in the original act.

Mr. CURTIS. If that was in the original act, then I have no further comment to make upon it, but the first part of it undoubtedly changes the existing law, a general statute, not a private bill but a general act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Did the law affect the right of everybody?

Mr. CURTIS. In that tribe.

Mr. CLAPP. It applies, of course, to all who were entitled to enrollment where suits were not pending.

I may say in explanation, although not germane perhaps to the thought in the mind of the Vice President, that suits were pending here involving patents, and in order to clarify the situation it was thought that a roll ought to be prepared of those who clearly were not involved in litigation. The fact that it is a general act of Congress does not make it necessarily a general law. It is purely a local law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any doubt about this being true, that the law was applicable to any other person or persons who may come under its provisions, or is it a general law or a special law?

Mr. CLAPP. It applied to anybody generally who should come under it, but it is limited to one tribe of Indians. Now, the fact that it may allow 10 or 50 members of that tribe to come under it would not make it general legislation. It is limited to one.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not the understanding of the Senator from Minnesota that in order to be general legislation it must apply to all Indians?

Mr. CLAPP. No; not at all. But it should be general, and not purely local. It is a purely local act, applicable to one reservation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; but it applies to everybody on the reservation.

Mr. CURTIS. Or who claims a right to the tribal property.

Mr. CLAPP. A bill providing for the taxation of the Indians of a State would apply to all who had any property subject to taxation. It would not follow that it would be general legislation. It would be local.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Would the Senator say that we could amend that act on an appropriation bill?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly this is not new legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; it is not new legislation. But the difficulty which the Chair is laboring under is whether in the clear definition of what constitutes general legislation the original act was not legislation, and whether this in not an amendment of general legislation.

Mr. CURTIS. This amendment was in an Indian appropriation bill, and Vice President Fairbanks held in the Creek claim that where it is attempted to amend an Indian appropriation bill, it is an attempt to amend general legislation, and that the point of order was well taken against the Creek claim.

I remember very well, because I made the point of order, when the Creek cliam was pending as an amendment on the Indian appropriation bill. There is no question but that this amendment changes an Indian appropriation act which is a general act—it is not a private act—and this amendment is therefore general legislation.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, there can be many items in an appropriation bill. Although the bill itself is a general act, the items would not in themselves be general. This was a purely local act in its inception. It was put on an appropriation bill. That did not change the character of the act. It was still a local act applicable only to one tribe of Indians.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not interested in the legislation particularly, but it does seem to me that if this legislation applied to one Indian in a tribe it would not be general legislation; but it is legislation affecting every Indian in the tribe, and I can not see but what it is general legislation. It appears to me that way. If the legislation became effective, it would affect Indians who are now denied the privilege of going upon the rolls. So it does not only affect the Indians now upon the rolls of that tribe, but it affects the Indians also who belong to the tribe who have been refused the privilege of going upon the rolls. If that is not general legislation, I do not know what it is.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator does not understand the scope of the enrollment. The enrollment establishes no legal right at all. It is simply to distinguish and eliminate from controversy those particular Indians who were not involved in litigation. It fixes no right.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand the amendment virtually to open the rolls?

Mr. CLAPP. Oh, no; nothing of the kind.

Mr. LANE. If the Senator will permit me, I am informed that all the Indians who are left there are interested.

Mr. SMOOT. Upon the rolls?

Mr. LANE. Yes; upon the rolls. I am also informed that in addition to that it is almost impossible to determine who a mixed blood is, and that the Indians themselves are not permitted to testify; that their testimony is excluded. In a way it has been announced to them that, inasmuch as they have no records, they are not informed upon the subject. They claim it is discriminating against them—to discredit for the reason that they keep no family records.

Mr. CLAPP. As to the difficulty of determining whether an Indian is of full blood or mixed blood, no one can question that; but the broad statement that they are not permitted to testify would be a reflection upon the court, because this is under the management and control of the Federal district court.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does this change enlarge the rights of persons to be placed on the rolls?

Mr. CLAPP. No, sir; this roll has nothing to do with the question whether an unenrolled Indian of that band, in deriving the benefits of enrollment, can secure a legal status that gives him those benefits.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What is the roll for?

Mr. CLAPP. As I have said, there were a number of suits brought. There is some question about the suits. They have been delayed. At the same time it has been thought advisable by the department and everyone interested that in the interim there might be made under the direction of the court, and with the court's approval, a list. It was called a roll, but it is not the kind of a roll which entitles an Indian to annuity or to allotment or to any other right as an enrolled member of a band or tribe. It was thought it would clear the situation if these two men, one to be selected by the Department of the Interior, and now proposed to be selected by the Department of Justice, and the other a citizen and resident of the State, might go to work and make a list of Indians about whom there could be no question, that list to be approved by the court. It does not add to or take from any Indian any legal right which he has.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But it becomes, does it not, a public document that might be introduced in evidence.

Mr. CLAPP. It is somewhat doubtful, perhaps, as to its effect in a court as evidence.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does not the amendment change the persons who can be enrolled?

Mr. CLAPP. No, sir; it is not a question——

The VICE PRESIDENT. What is the change, then? Why is it in the bill if it makes no such change?

Mr. SMOOT. Why is the amendment asked?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. I tried to explain. The amendment was asked and very heartily concurred in by the Interior Department at first, to the end that under the direction of the court a list might be made that would be generally accepted as determining who were mixed bloods and who were half bloods. It is not an enrollment that gives rights in the tribal participation, like the ordinary rolls that are made up when a treaty is agreed upon. For instance, when this treaty was made——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the Chair interrupt there. What difference does it make as to whether an Indian is full blood or mixed blood if it has nothing to do with his interest in the tribal property?

Mr. CLAPP. The difference is this: In 1906 an act was passed removing the restriction from the mixed bloods. It does not interfere with their property. It does not interfere in any manner with their right to participate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What does it designate?

Mr. CLAPP. It simply designates in an orderly way, probably to the satisfaction of most who would consult the list, that certain Indians are in fact mixed blood and consequently entitled to deed their property while a full blood under the law is still under restriction.

Mr. SMOOT. But is it not true, I will ask the Senator, that if an Indian is allowed to be placed upon the roll it affects the property of every Indian who is already upon the roll?

Mr. CLAPP. Not in the slightest. I have tried to make it plain that this is not the granting of any property right, nor does it in any manner affect an Indian's right to participate in the property. It simply means that if an Indian is of mixed blood he may sell his individual property that has been allotted to him. If he is not of mixed blood he can not sell his individual property. It gives him no right to participate——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then it affects rights to that extent.

Mr. CLAPP. It does not affect the right. The right is there. If an Indian is of mixed blood on that reservation he has the right to sell. If he is not of mixed blood he has not the right. This does not make him a mixed blood nor a full blood. It does not take from him any right or grant any right. He could still go on if he was of mixed blood and sell his property and try that question out in the courts. He could still go on if he was a full blood and sell his property, and on establishing the fact that he was a full blood the deed would be void. It does not affect their property rights in the property of the tribe. It is not one of those cases.

I was proceeding to say when the President of the Senate interrupted me, that under the original treaty of 1889 it was provided that a roll should be made. That roll related to their rights to participate in the property of the tribe. That right is not affected at all by this roll. In this, if a person wants to rely upon it, they can simply say they believe this man is mixed blood or the other one full blood.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to discuss the question of the roll any further, but it does seem to me, on page 43, beginning in line 17, this is certainly general legislation:

> To carry into effect the act entitled "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota, approved January 14, 1889, to provide for the establishment and administration of a forest reserve and for the sale of timber within the Red Lake Indian Reservation, Minn.," that the following-described lands within the Red Lake Indian Reservation, Minn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is another amendment.

Mr. CLAPP. It is another amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood that the Senator from Kansas made a point of order against the whole of the amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. No; I made the point of order where it commenced just above that.

Now, Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would like to have a little further information. The Chair wants to know whether this roll could be used in court?

Mr. CURTIS. Here is what the original act provides:

> When the roll so made is completed, it shall be presented to the said district court for final approval. If the commissioners disagree as to the proper status of any allottee, they shall submit the question to the court for determination, upon such final presentation of the roll.

That was under the old law, where the quantum of blood had to be found. Under this amendment they do not find the quantum of blood but find whether or not the Indian is full blood or part blood. This roll, when made under the existing law, shall be filed with the recorder of the county and upon it the right of the enrolled person to sell depends—that is, if it shows that he is a part blood under the law he may sell his allotment. Before they had to find the quantum before he could sell. Under this law, if he is a full blood and the rolls which have been filed with the register of deeds so show, he can not sell his allotment, and of course that record could be used in a court to show whether or not the party who sold was of part blood or full blood.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I am inclined to think that possibly it might be used prima facie; but no one will contend that the determination by this commission and the approval of the court can settle the question of the right of an Indian to sell or the validity of a sale which he has made in a proceeding in which the parties in interest are not made parties. Notwithstanding these commissioners might find that John Smith was a full blood, nevertheless if some person had bought of John Smith, he not being a party to this proceeding, he would not be estopped from showing that John Smith was in fact of mixed blood. On the other hand, purchasing of John Smith as a mixed blood, neither he nor Smith's heirs would be estopped, nor do I think John Smith could be estopped. He is not cited in here. He may be examined. He may come here before this commission and testify before the court, but he is not cited here under this proceeding.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does not the Congress of the United States retain control over the Indians and Indian property?

Mr. CLAPP. It does where they are full bloods.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes. Now——

Mr. CLAPP. Where they were mixed bloods at the time of the passage of the act of 1906, it has no control over them at all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Now, suppose the Congress of the United States retains jurisdiction over the person and property of full-blood Indians. The former act provided what proportion of mixed blood there should be in order to show that they were not full-blood Indians. The Senator says that if a mixed blood was enrolled as a full blood, he could not be deprived thereby of his right to sell his land. But take the reverse of it. Suppose a full blood by an act of Congress is authorized to be enrolled as a mixed blood, he may sell.

Mr. CLAPP. But, Mr. President, he is not authorized to be enrolled as a mixed blood. If the commission enroll him as a mixed blood, they have made a mistake, and they are——

The VICE PRESIDENT. These rolls are either worth something or else they ought not to be——

Mr. CURTIS. Right on that point I should like to read the act:

> The copy of the roll filed at the agency office at White Earth shall at all times be open to public inspection and copies thereof may be made and filed for record with the registers of deeds of the various counties in which the lands described therein are situated, and such roll, when so made, approved, and filed, shall be final and conclusive as to the facts stated therein and shall be deemed a record of the United States District Court for the District of Minnesota, and entitled to be received in evidence as such.

That will settle the question.

Mr. CLAPP. That will be prima facie evidence.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Well——

Mr. CLAPP. Just a moment, if the Chair will pardon me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes, the Chair would like to hear the Senator upon what theory of law he would hold that as against a full-blood Indian this was prima facie evidence.

Mr. CLAPP. I suppose you can always make a prima facie presumption against the existence of a fact. It is an inconclusive presumption based upon the fact that back of that inconclusive presumption is the fact which it does not overcome.

If that particular section of the amendment is considered at all decisive, while I think it is unfortunate to strike it out, because it would very materially lessen the work, I will agree to strike out the part beginning with line 3, on page 42, and ending on line 18, of page 42. It does not seem to me that it is decisive, but if the Chair thinks it is I am willing that it shall be stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has some notions on what constitutes general legislation. Legislation which may be for a tribe of Indians may be special and, on the other hand, it may be general in its character. This amendment seems to the Chair to be an amendment of a general statute, with reference to the enrolling of these Indians, and the Chair can not see with the Senator from Minnesota that that roll is only prima facie. It does not so express it in the act. It seems to be absolutely conclusive upon everybody who went on the roll.

Mr. CLAPP. Then, before the final ruling, I move to amend the amendment by striking out all of page 42 from line 3 to line 18, inclusive.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that motion will be entertained and the amendment to the amendment will be made. Has the Senator from Kansas any suggestion to make as to the balance of it?

Mr. CURTIS. Of course, I made the point of order on the whole amendment—and I think the point of order should have been sustained—and then the Senator from Minnesota should have offered the other provision as an amendment. In my judgment, the first part of it is immaterial; that is, it simply delegates another man to take care of the work in the Department of Justice. But at the bottom of page 42——

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is only a reappropriation of money.

Mr. CURTIS. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to those provisions. My main point was made on the amendment from line 3 to line 18. If that is stricken out, I shall not insist upon the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is stricken out.

Mr. CLAPP. I did not care about that except that it did lessen the work.

Mr. LANE. Before we leave the subject, I should like to correct a statement. It seems as though the Senator from Minnesota understood me to say that Indians were not allowed to testify. What I meant to say, or should have said, was that no credibility is given to their testimony; at least I was so assurred by them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I wish to suggest a mere formal amendment. At the bottom of page 41, I move to strike out the words, in line 24, "an assistant" and to insert the words "selected from among the special assistants," so that it will read:

> Shall be selected from among the special assistants to the Attorney General.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I desire to make a suggestion as to the parliamentary procedure. I have an amendment to offer to the next committee amendment. Unless it is desired to first read the amendment as it appears in the bill, I will offer my amendment now, or perhaps I had better allow the committee amendment to first be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the committee will first be stated.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 43, after line 16, to insert:

> To carry into effect the act entitled "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota, approved January 14, 1889, to provide for the establishment and administration of a forest reserve and for the sale of timber within the Red Lake Indian Reservation, Minn.," that the following-described lands within the Red Lake Indian Reservation, Minn., be, and the same hereby are, created into a forest reserve, to be known as the Red Lake Indian Forest: Townships 150 and 151 north, ranges 32, 33, 34, 35, and 36 west, and townships 152 and 153 north, ranges 32, 33, and 34 west of the fifth principal meridian, except the lands in townships 151 north, range 36 west, which lie north of the north line of sections 26 to 30, inclusive, and except all lands within sections 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 18, in township 153 north, range 34 west. The provisions of this section shall not apply to any lands which have heretofore been reserved for school, agency, church, or town-site purposes or granted to private parties or corporations within the area described, nor to the town site of Red Lake, for the creation of which provision is made herein: Provided, That when any of said lands are no longer needed for the purpose for which they are reserved, the Secretary of the Interior may declare such lands to be a part of the Red Lake Indian Forest.
> That lands within the area defined by section 1 of this act which in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior are better suited for the production of agricultural crops than for timber crops may be allotted to individual Red Lake Indians at such time as allotments shall be made to these Indians: Provided, That no allotment shall exceed 80 acres nor have more than 40 rods fronting upon a lake shore: And provided further, That the merchantable timber on such lands at the time of allotment shall belong to the Red Lake Indians as a tribe, and patents shall not be issued to allottees until the merchantable timber has been removed.
> That the forest shall be administered by the Secretary of the Interior in accordance with the principles of scientific forestry, with a view to the production of successive timber crops thereon. The said Secretary is hereby authorized to sell stumpage, logs, piling, poles, posts, pulp wood, lumber, lath, shingles, and other marketable products under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and to establish such sawmills and accessories as may be necessary to manufacture the timber into various products, and he may purchase such equipment and employ such persons as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, including the establishment of nurseries, and the purchase of seeds, seedlings, and transplants, when needed for reforestation purposes: Provided, That no contract shall be made for the establishment of any mill, or to carry on any logging or lumbering operations which shall constitute a charge upon the proceeds of the timber, until an estimate of the cost thereof shall have first been submitted to and approved by Congress.
> That the Secretary of the Interior may issue permits or grant leases on such lands for camping or other purposes. No permit shall be issued for a longer term than one year and no lease shall be executed for a longer term than 10 years. Every permit or lease issued under authority of this act to Indians, or to other persons or corporations, and every patent for an allotment within the limits of the forest created by section 1 shall reserve to the United States the right to cross the land covered hereby with logging roads or railroads, to use the shore line, or to erect thereon and use such structures as shall be necessary to the proper and economical management of the Indian forest created by this act; and the Secretary of the Interior may reserve from allotment tracts considered necessary for such administration.
> After the payment of all expenses connected with the administration of these lands as provided in sections 3 and 4, the net proceeds therefrom shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Red Lake Indians and draw interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum. The interest on this fund may be used by the Secretary of the Interior in such manner as he shall consider most advantageous and beneficial to the Red Lake Indians. Expenditure from the principal shall be made only after the approval by Congress of estimates submitted by the said Secretary.

That the Secretary of the Interior shall select and set apart an area not exceeding 200 acres, in sections 20, 21, 28, and 29, township 151 north, range 34 west, cause the lands thus selected to be surveyed and platted into suitable lots, streets, and alleys, and dedicate said streets and alleys and such lots and parcels as he may consider necessary to public uses. The lands thus selected shall not be allotted, but held as an Indian town site subject to further legislation by Congress.

That the timber on lands of the Red Lake Indian Reservation outside the boundaries of the forest created by section 1 may be sold under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and the proceeds administered under the provisions of the general deficiency act of March 3, 1883 (22 Stat. L., p. 590), and the Indian appropriation act of March 2, 1887 (24 Stat. L., p. 463).

That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the terms of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. CLAPP. Now, Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague [Mr. NELSON] I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment which has just been read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota on behalf of his colleague will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment, on page 44, line 12, by striking out the word "section" and inserting the word "paragraph."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Beginning in line 21, on page 44, it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by striking out down to the word "Provided," in line 20, on page 45, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

That lands within said Red Lake Indian forest which are not covered with standing and growing merchantable pine timber and which are suited for the production of agricultural crops and which are fronting upon a lake shore may be allotted to individual Red Lake Indians: Provided, That no such allotment shall exceed 80 acres nor have more than 80 rods fronting upon a lake shore: Provided further, That in case an Indian has improved and cultivated more than 80 acres, his allotment may embrace his improvements to the extent of 160 acres.

That said forest shall be administered by the Secretary of the Interior in accordance with the principles of scientific forestry, with a view to the production of successive timber crops thereon, and he is hereby authorized to sell and manufacture only such standing and growing pine and oak timber as is mature and has ceased to grow, and he is also authorized to sell and manufacture from time to time such other mature and marketable timber as he may deem advisable, and he is further authorized to construct and operate sawmills for the manufacture of the timber into merchantable products and to employ such persons as he shall find necessary to carry out the purposes of the foregoing provisions, including the establishment of nurseries and the purchase of seeds, seedlings, and transplants when needed for reforestation purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, before that amendment to the committee amendment is adopted, I desire to say that the Senator from Minnesota will remember when the matter was before the committee I objected to the word "marketable." Of course, that would include all of the timber. I understood that this timberland was being set aside as a forest reserve.

Mr. CLAPP. It is.

Mr. GRONNA. I can not conceive why we should permit all of the timber to be cut down and sold if the land is to constitute a forest reserve.

Mr. CLAPP. The word "marketable"——

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will pardon me, I should have no objection to disposing of the dead and down timber, but I do not believe that we ought to permit the sale of the timber if this legislation is for the purpose of conserving it.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator from North Dakota will observe that the word "marketable" is simply the complement to the word "mature." The language is:

From time to time such other mature and marketable timber as he may deem advisable.

Above that the language relates solely to growing pine and oak timber.

Shall be administered * * * in accordance with the principles of scientific forestry.

The Secretary of the Interior is also authorized, in addition to pine and oak—to sell and manufacture from time to time such other mature and marketable timber as he may deem advisable.

I do not think it conflicts with the Senator's view of the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota, on behalf of his colleague, will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 46, in lines 2 and 3, it is proposed to strike out the words "or other purposes" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "or farming."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota on behalf of his colleague.

The SECRETARY. On page 46, line 5, it is proposed to strike out the word "ten," and to insert in lieu thereof the word "five."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota on behalf of his colleague.

The SECRETARY. On page 46, lines 16 and 17, it is proposed to strike out the words "in sections 3 and 4," and to insert, in line 16, on the same page, between the words "as" and "provided," the word "herein."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota on behalf of his colleague.

The SECRETARY. On page 47, it is proposed to strike out all of lines 21 and 22.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment reported by the committee as amended.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, if a point of order will lie against this amendment, I should like to make it. The full-blood Indians object to this legislation for the reason that it is realloting them a small portion of their lands and confining them to that portion when they own it all. They want to use these timber lands to camp in and to live in, and under this provision they only get a permit to do so, which has to be renewed from time to time. This is general legislation, which a majority of the full-blood Indians do not want and which they have petitioned us not to pass. They have written a brief on the subject which will appeal to the sense of justice and right of any man who hears it read.

This is a measure, I think, mostly in the interest of the whites and not for the benefit of the Indians. The lowlands, the swamp lands, are lands which are unfit for cultivation, for the reason that they are too wet. Now, their timberlands are going out of their possession, and they say that there is another timber reserve not a great many miles from them, and they ask that this provision may not be adopted.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Oregon a question. So many changes have been made in this amendment that I really do not know what it now does provide for; but is it not the Senator's understanding that the timber is to be disposed of under the ordinary terms of stumpage, or is it to be disposed of on what we call "bank scales"? There is an act known as the Morris Act, and the timber on another reservation not very far from this one was disposed of under that act. I know that the Indians in that country want that act to be applied in case this legislation is passed, and I ask the Senator from Oregon if he knows whether or not that act would apply?

Mr. LANE. I will say to the Senator from North Dakota that I do not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there not some general law with reference to this reservation relative to the rights of the Indians?

Mr. LANE. If there is such a law, this bill proposes to change it and to give them a permit.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is asking whether there is such a law?

Mr. LANE. I do not know. The Senator from Minnesota may know.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I should like to answer the question. In 1889 the so-called Nelson Act was passed and the treaty ratified. Following that we enacted the Morris Act with reference to the Cass Lake, Leech Lake, and Winnibigoshish Lake Reservations. The Morris Act would not apply to these plans at all. The Morris Act provided that a small area of land—I forget the amount, as the legislation was passed some years ago; but it seems to me that it was 10 sections—should be set apart as a permanent reserve and should not be touched at all. Then, the act provided that the land within certain large areas, including, I think—I am speaking now from memory—about 400,000 acres, should be sold down to 5 per cent of the timber—

5 per cent being left. Subsequently we changed that to 10 per cent. The timber that was in the reserve was then sold and the entire amount taken off, and outside of the reserve all of the timber was removed. The present pine stand in Red Lake Reservation is probably one of the best white-pine stands left in this country; and I want to pay my colleague [Mr. NELSON] the compliment of saying that this was very largely his thought, and the provision is largely due to his effort. I most heartily concur in the thought that instead of denuding that land of the timber we should maintain a system whereby the young and immature timber can be left standing, so that it may grow and mature.

Some years ago we adopted a plan somewhat similar to this in the Menominee Reservation, only there the Government went into lumbering operations; and while I think the experiment was a wise one with the light we then had, in this amendment the two plans are preserved—the Government will sell the timber which has ceased to grow and is practically what we call "dead and down," and also, aside from the oak and pine, the mature and marketable timber of other varieties—spruce, tamarack, and so forth.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota a question right there. What does he mean by "mature and marketable," if it does not include both?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The trouble is that we are getting away from the point of order.

Mr. LANE. That is true.

Mr. CLAPP. But the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] asked certain questions with reference to the matter, and I desired to answer him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order has been made that the amendment is general legislation, and the Chair is inclined to think it is, but is perfectly willing to hear discussion on the question.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Chair will listen for a moment on that point, this is a bill "making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes." The amendment is for the purpose of carrying out the very act and the treaty. It is so recited in the beginning of the amendment itself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands as to that, but what is there in the treaty with the Red Lake Indians which requires this action on the part of Congress?

Mr. CLAPP. Because some disposition remains to be made of this timber following the treaty and the act completing the treaty enacted in 1889. To-day nothing can be done to carry out the treaty with reference to this pine until there is subsequent legislation. There can be no question about that.

Mr. GRONNA. The provisions of this bill clearly change existing law, in that it will permit all of the timber to be sold, instead of, as under the present law, requiring the Government to keep it under its control and providing that none of it can be sold except with the consent of the Government.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; and the Government to-day is trustee, Mr. President, for the Indians. The Nelson Act of 1889 did not contemplate the fruition of the trusteeship of the Government. It simply made provision that as to certain reservations allotments should be made, leaving it for supplemental legislation to provide for allotments on other reservations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is this one of them?

Mr. CLAPP. This is one of them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A reservation on which allotments could be made?

Mr. CLAPP. Oh, no. This is one of the reservations as to which there has been no legislation since then. This proposed legislation is to carry out the treaty and the law enacted pursuant to the treaty of 1889. I am so confident of that that I have no hesitation in making the statement.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not think any member of the committee disagrees with the Senator in regard to that; but is it not a fact, this being an Indian reservation on which no allotments have been made, that the amendment changes the law and permits allotments to be made?

Mr. CLAPP. Why, Mr. President, supposing there were an Indian reservation that had not yet been allotted, and that in the process of its development it remained unallotted, would it be urged that a provision to carry forward the allotment of that reservation would be subject to a point of order? The pending amendment is designed to carry out the agreement, the purpose, and the policy of the Nelson Act of 1889. On certain reservations provision was made for allotment. On certain reservations provision was made for cutting the timber. To-day not one thing can be done along this line without additional legislation, because it was contemplated by the Nelson Act—and anyone who will read and study that act will see that that was its purpose—that subsequent legislation to carry it out should be enacted. Whatever may be said of the defect of this plan, it seems to me beyond question that it is within the purview of an Indian appropriation bill, fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there anything in the treaty that calls upon the Government to take this action?

Mr. CLAPP. Why, the uncompleted condition——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not talking about "uncompleted condition"; the Chair is talking about the treaty.

Mr. CLAPP. There is nothing that I recall now in the treaty that says that we should sell timber or that we should manufacture lumber. It is there, however; and every year, because of the lack of some legislation, hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of it is being wasted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not a question for the Chair to take into consideration.

Mr. CLAPP. I know that is not a question to be considered in connection with the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point is this: Here is an Indian reservation; there is a general law by which the Indian Bureau manages such reservations; there is nothing in the treaty with the Red Lake Indians which requires the enactment of this provision. It is not, therefore, in fulfillment of any treaty obligation, but it does, as to the Red Lake Reservation, change the method of the administration of the Indian reservation; and the Chair can not see how it is otherwise than general legislation.

Mr. CLAPP. It is a provision which the treaty contemplated. We change nothing, except we move forward in order to bring about allotments and to provide for the preservation of the timber on that land.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Beyond all doubt, the right exists to do that by a general bill; but it does not carry out any agreement made with these Indians by being put on this bill, and that is the only ground on which it could be put here.

Mr. CLAPP. It is not carrying out the treaty, perhaps, in express terms; but when the Indians ceded a portion of this land and the reservation was diminished, provision was made, and in the nature of things had to be made, for allotment. We are not changing any existing law. There is no law that I know of—and I do not think a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs knows of any law—under which the department can cut the timber upon this reservation. Now, if there is no law authorizing the department to do that, it is not changing existing law; it is simply supplementing the absence of law by a grant of proper authority.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Minnesota another question?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRONNA. Does it not, then, change existing law in that it permits the timber to be cut and sold, which is something that can not be done at the present time without additional legislation?

Mr. CLAPP. It does not change a law that has been enacted; there has been no law enacted prohibiting the cutting and selling of this timber. In the absence of law, it is the mere granting of authority. I hope the Senator from Oregon will not insist upon the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the point of order is insisted on, the Chair feels that this is general legislation on an appropriation bill, and that it is not carrying out treaty stipulations, so far as the Chair has been informed.

Mr. LANE. I insist on the point of order, on behalf of the Indians.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair may be wrong about it, and would welcome an appeal to the Senate.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, an appeal will disclose a condition that will result, I apprehend, in the suspension of the consideration of the bill this afternoon, it being half past 4 o'clock. I will ask, however, if it is permissible, that the Chair withhold his ruling until to-morrow, when conditions may be different.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will withhold the ruling until to-morrow, but, like the Indiana justice, who said he would not rule until Monday morning next, although he would lay $5 that a certain man was beaten in the case, the Chair is of the opinion that the point of order will be sustained.

Mr. CLAPP. I understand that to-morrow the Chair will rule the same way, but there will then be a somewhat different condition, perhaps, in the Senate.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. OWEN. I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. CLAPP. I am not through, but I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. OWEN. I will not ask the Senator to yield now.

Mr. CLAPP. Under the law of Minnesota, in order to lay out highways the court can only approve of a plan whereby all the property benefited by the plan comes under the assessment scheme embraced in the general provision, and I send an amendment to the desk and ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is it a committee amendment?

Mr. CLAPP. It is an amendment that was omitted, I think; but it is not a committee amendment; so I will ask to have it printed and lie on the table.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to inquire if that is an amendment to the paragraph which we just had under discussion?

Mr. CLAPP. No.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 47, after line 22, to insert:

MISSISSIPPI.

SEC. 10. To enable the Secretary of the Interior to investigate the condition of the Indians living in Mississippi and report to Congress on the first Monday of next December as to their need for additional land and school facilities, $1,000, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Montana," on page 48, line 5, to change the number of the section from 10 to 11.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, line 9, after the word "employees," to strike out "$14,000" and to insert "$20,000, of which amount not exceeding $4,500 shall be expended for salaries," so as to make the clause read:

For support and civilization of Indians at Flathead Agency, Mont., including pay of employees, $20,000, of which amount not exceeding $4,500 shall be expended for salaries.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, line 15, after the word "employees," to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$10,000," so as to make the clause read:

For the support and civilization of Rocky Boy's Band of Chippewas, and other indigent and homeless Indians in the State of Montana, including pay of employees, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary proceeded to read the amendment, beginning at the top of page 51, which in full is to insert the following words:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to announce, at such time as in his opinion seems proper, the charge for construction of irrigation systems on the Blackfeet, Flathead, and Fort Peck Indian Reservations in Montana, which shall be made against each acre of land irrigable by the systems on each of said reservations. Such charges shall be assessed against the land irrigable by the systems on each said reservation in the proportion of the total construction cost which each acre of such land bears to the whole area of irrigable land thereunder.

On the 1st day of December after the announcement by the Secretary of the Interior of the construction charge the allottee, entryman, purchaser, or owner of such irrigable land which might have been furnished water for irrigation during the whole of the preceding irrigation season, from ditches actually constructed, shall pay to the superintendent of the reservation where the land is located, for deposit to the credit of the United States as a reimbursement of the appropriations made or to be made for construction of said irrigation systems, 5 per cent of the construction charge fixed for his land, as an initial installment, and shall pay the balance of the charge in 15 annual installments, the first 5 of which shall each be 5 per cent of the construction charge and the remainder shall each be 7 per cent of the construction charge. The first of the annual installments shall become due and payable on December 1, of the fifth calendar year after the initial installment: Provided, That any allottee, entryman, purchaser, or owner may, if he so elects, pay the whole or any part of the construction charges within any shorter period: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, grant such extension of the time for payments herein required from Indian allottees or their heirs as he may determine proper and necessary, so long as such land remains in Indian title.

That the tribal funds heretofore covered into the Treasury of the United States in partial reimbursement of appropriations made for constructing irrigation systems on said reservations shall be placed to the credit of the tribe and be available for such expenditure for the benefit of the tribe as may be made under existing law.

The cost of constructing irrigation systems to irrigate allotted lands of the Indians on these reservations shall be reimbursed to the United States as hereinbefore provided, and no further reimbursements from the tribal funds shall be made on account of said irrigation works except that all charges against Indian allottees or their heirs herein authorized, unless otherwise paid, may be paid from the individual shares in the tribal funds, when the same is available for distribution, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

That the sum of $50,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money not otherwise appropriated for continuing construction of the irrigation systems on the Blackfeet Indian Reservation in Montana, which shall be immediately available and remain available until expended: Provided, That the entryman upon the surplus unallotted lands to be irrigated by such systems shall, in addition to compliance with the homestead laws, before receiving patent for the lands covered by his entry, pay the charges apportioned against such tract as herein authorized, and a failure to make any two payments when due shall render the entry subject to cancellation, with the forfeiture to the United States of all rights acquired under the provisions of this act, as well as of any moneys paid on account thereof. The purchaser of any Indian allotment to be irrigated by such systems, purchased upon approval of the Secretary of the Interior, before the charges against said allotment herein authorized shall have been paid, shall pay all charges remaining unpaid at the time of such purchase, and in all patents or deeds for such purchased allotments, and also in all patents in fee to allottees or their heirs issued before payment of all such charges herein authorized to be made against their allotments, there shall be expressed that there is reserved upon the lands therein described a lien for such charges, and such lien may be enforced, or, upon payment of the delinquent charges, may be released by the Secretary of the Interior.

That the sum of $750,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for construction of irrigation systems on the Flathead Indian Reservation in Montana, which shall be immediately available and remain available until expended: Provided, That the payments for the proportionate cost of the construction of said systems required of settlers on the surplus unallotted land by section 9, chapter 1495, Statutes of the United States of America, entitled "An act for the survey and allotment of lands now embraced within the limits of the Flathead Indian Reservation in the State of Montana, and the sale and disposal of all surplus lands after allotment," as amended by section 15 of the act of May 29, 1908 (35 Stat. L., 448), shall be made as herein provided: Provided further, That nothing contained in the act of May 29, 1908 (35 Stat. L., 444), shall be construed to exempt the purchaser of any Indian allotment purchased prior to the expiration of the trust period thereon from any charge for construction of the irrigation system incurred up to the time of such purchase, except such charges as shall have accrued and become due in accordance with the public notices herein provided for, or to relieve the owners of any or all land allotted to Indians in severalty from payment of the charges herein required to be made against said land on account of construction of the irrigation systems; and in carrying out the provisions of said section the exemption therein authorized from charges incurred against allotments purchased prior to the expiration of the trust period thereon shall be the amount of the charges or installments thereof due under public notice herein provided for up to the time of such purchase.

That the sum of $100,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for continuing construction of the irrigation systems on the Fort Peck Indian Reservation in Montana, which shall be immediately available and remain available until expended: Provided, That the proportionate cost of the construction of said systems required of settlers and entrymen on the surplus unallotted irrigable land by section 2 of the act of May 30, 1908 (35 Stat. L., 558), shall be paid as herein provided: Provided further, That nothing contained in said act of May 30, 1908, shall be construed to exempt the purchaser of any Indian allotment purchased prior to the expiration of the trust period thereon from any charge for construction of the irrigation system incurred up to the time of such purchase, except such charges as shall have accrued and become due in accordance with the public notices herein provided for, and the purchaser of any Indian allotment to be irrigated by said systems purchased upon approval of the Secretary of the Interior before the charges against said allotment herein authorized shall have been paid shall pay all charges remaining unpaid at the time of such purchase, and in all patents or deeds for such purchased allotments, and also in all patents in fee to allottees or their heirs issued before payment shall have been made of all such charges herein authorized to be made against their allotments, there shall be expressed that there is reserved upon the lands therein described a lien for such charges, and such lien may be enforced, or upon payment of the delinquent charges may be released by the Secretary of the Interior.

That in addition to the construction charges every allottee, entryman, purchaser, or owner shall pay to the superintendent of the reservation a maintenance and operation charge based upon the total cost of maintenance and operation of the systems on the several reservations, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to fix such maintenance and operation charge upon such basis as shall be equitable to the owners of the irrigable land. Such charges, when collected, shall be available for expenditure in the maintenance and operation of the systems on the reservation where collected: Provided, That delivery of water to any tract of land may be refused on account of nonpayment of any charges herein authorized, and the same may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be collected by a suit for money owed: Provided further, That the rights of the United States heretofore acquired to water for Indian lands referred to in the foregoing provision, namely, the Blackfeet, Fort Peck, and Flathead Reservation land, shall be continued in full force and effect until the Indian title to such land is extinguished.

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to prescribe such rules and regulations and issue such notices as may be necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act, and he is hereby authorized and directed to determine the area of land on each reservation which may be irrigated from constructed ditches, and to determine what allowance, if any, shall be made for ditches constructed by individuals for the diversion and distribution of a partial or total water supply for allotted or surplus unallotted land: Provided, That if water be available prior to the announcement of the charge herein authorized, the Secretary of the Interior may furnish water to land under the systems on the said reservations, making a reasonable charge therefor, and such charges, when collected, may be used for construction or maintenance of the systems through which such water shall have been furnished.

The work to be done with the amounts herein appropriated for the completion of the Blackfeet, Flathead, and Fort Peck projects may be done by the Reclamation Service on plans and estimates furnished by that service and approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs: Provided, That not to exceed $19,575 of applicable appropriations made for the Flathead, Blackfeet, and Fort Peck irrigation projects shall be available for the maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles for official use upon the aforesaid irrigation projects: Provided further, That not to exceed $8,865 may be used for the purchase of horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles, and that not to exceed $1,500 may be used for the purchase of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles.

During the reading of the foregoing amendment,

Mr. CURTIS. That is all one amendment over to page 58.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the amendment and read to line 2, on page 54.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, at that point an amendment authorized by the committee, but not printed, should be offered, and, with the consent of the chairman, I will tender it at this time.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, it is my purpose to make a point of order against that entire amendment, and I think we might save time by going ahead. Of course, if it is overruled, then the amendment could be offered. I have no objection to its being offered now, but I do not want the vote taken without making the point of order on the whole amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to say that I think the Senator from Kansas is in error in assuming that the amendment just read, commencing at the top of page 53, forms a part of what precedes it. I think it will be found that what precedes page 53 is a separate subject.

Mr. CURTIS. It was all submitted as one item, and it is referred to all the way through as the same amendment. The first paragraph refers to the reservations, and it closes with a reference to the reservations.

Mr. WALSH. I tender the amendment at this time.

Mr. ASHURST. Let the amendment be agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like to call attention to the following language on page 58:

The work to be done with the amounts herein appropriated for the completion of the Blackfeet, Flathead, and Fort Peck projects may be done by the Reclamation Service—

And so forth.

That language applies to the whole of the amendment from page 51 to page 58. It was submitted as a separate item, and estimated for in one item, and was so sent to the committee, and was put in and treated as one amendment.

Mr. WALSH. However, I offer the amendment here, as authorized by the committee. It should be inserted on page 54, after line 2. I ask the Secretary to read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 54, after line 2, it is proposed to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to expend the sum of $22,400 from any money now available for construction of irrigation systems on the Blackfeet Reservation in Montana in the purchase of lands embraced in the allotments of George W. Cook and David La Breche, described as lots 3 and 5, section 27, and lots 1 and 2, section 34, township 32 north, range 13 west, together with all the improvements thereon, in consideration of the relinquishment by the allottees of all their right, title, and interest in and to said lands and improvements, and of their right to select lieu land under the provisions of section 14 of the act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. L., 855, 859), and the release of all their claims whatsoever against the United States or the Blackfeet Tribe of Indians by reason of said lands being required for reservoir purposes in connection with the irrigation system on the aforesaid Indian reservation

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I submit with the amendment a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior explaining it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana wish to have the letter read?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 21, 1916.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have received your letter of March 16, 1916, regarding an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1917, authorizing the settlement of the Cook and La Breche case on the basis of paying them $22,400 for lands and improvements located at Lower Two Medicine Lake, Blackfeet Reservation, Mont.

In compliance with your request I have had prepared and submit herewith the draft of an amendment for insertion in H. R. 10385, which, it is believed, fully covers the situation. The matter of the preparation of papers for execution by claimants will be deferred pending the necessary authority for settlement on the basis mentioned.

You will observe that provision is made in the accompanying draft for the use of funds heretofore appropriated, and now set aside for this purpose. Legislation, however, is required in order that land may be purchased, inasmuch as existing law prohibits the purchase of land without specific provision.

As to the offer of Miss Helen P. Clarke and her brother, Horace J. Clarke, to accept $700 in settlement of damages by reason of the construction of a highway across their lands, provided settlement is not unduly delayed, this matter was brought to the attention of the Northern Pacific Railway Co. under date of March 1, 1916, and just as soon as we are advised concerning the offer you will be promptly communicated with on the subject.

A carbon copy of this letter is also inclosed.

Cordially, yours,

ANDRIEUS A. JONES,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. T. J. WALSH,
United States Senate.

Mr. WALSH. The facts constituting the basis of the settlement and adjustment referred to in the letter of the Secretary just read are set forth in a letter which is addressed to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs under date of January 11, 1916, which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action may be taken.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 11, 1916.

The COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

DEAR MR. COMMISSIONER: The department received your letter of November 27, 1915, transmitting the record in the matter of a hearing held at Blackfeet Agency, Mont., looking to the cancellation of allotments made to George W. Cook and David La Breche, Blackfeet Indians, under section 14 of the act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat., 855, 859), providing for the acquisition of Indian allotments in connection with irrigation projects.

The law provides that any Indian whose allotment or part thereof is required in connection with an irrigation project shall be reimbursed for all improvements on his canceled allotment and allotted land of equal value within the area subject to irrigation by any such project. These Indians originally claimed $20,000, which included the value of the lands embraced in their allotments and compensation for loss of time caused by litigation in the courts. Prior to the issuance of trust patents to said Indians and the above hearing unsuccessful efforts were made to adjust their claims. As the result of said hearing the special supervisor designated to conduct the same recommended settlement on the following basis:

Mill plant on La Breche land	$12,172.07
Labor and teams in setting up mill, building roads, etc	2,728.00
Improvements on Cook land	1,500.00
Repairs on fence, Cook	55.00
Use of roads for four years, Cook	800.00
Use of roads for four years, La Breche	800.00
Cost of litigation	1,000.00
Loss of use of capital and loss of time	3,895.00
Total	22,950.07

The last three items of the above recommendation, to wit, $1,600 for use of roads built by the Indians to get to their sawmill, and which roads they claim have been used by tourists going to Glacier Park for the past four years; $1,000 for cost of litigation, and $3,895 for loss of use of capital and loss of time, your office recommends be eliminated, and that there be awarded to the Indians $16,455.07, as follows:

Mill plant on La Breche land	$12,172.07
Labor and teams in setting up mill, building roads, etc	2,728.00
Improvements on Cook land	1,500.00
Repairs on fence, Cook	55.00
Total	16,455.07

It is clear that the items which your office recommends be eliminated in the settlement of these claims do not come within the act of June 25, 1910, providing for the acquisition of Indian allotments for irrigation purposes. Consequently, payment for such items is unauthorized, they not representing proper charges against the Indians' tribal fund under the irrigation project. Aside from plain want of authority to pay for the use of the roads it would seem that as it is proposed to compensate the Indians for the cost of building said roads they will receive all they are reasonably entitled to in this particular. Any award to these Indians for cost of litigation or for their alleged loss of time would not be a proper charge under the law which limits reimbursements to "improvements." In addition to the award of $16,455.07, the Indians are to be allotted lands of equal value within the area subject to irrigation by the project, on account of which their allotments are to be canceled, so that they will more than likely obtain in value an amount equal to, if not in excess of, that originally claimed by them.

Upon consideration of the entire record the department is willing to approve the claim of these Indians in the said amount of $16,455.07, as recommended by your office, they being entitled also to select lieu allotments of equal value, and your office will advise them to submit a claim accordingly.

Very truly, yours,

_____,
First Assistant Secretary.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I understand this is an amendment to the amendment. If it is, I will wait until it is acted upon, and I will make the point of order on the amendment as amended. My intention is to make a point of order on the amendment, commencing on page 51 and ending on page 58, on the ground that it is general legislation; and I should like to be heard on it. I am willing to argue the whole question now or will wait. The point is against the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The difficulty about it is that the Chair has no way of ascertaining whether this is to be treated as one amendment or not.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the Chair can only determine by reading the amendment. It commences with a proposition for the three tribes, and it ends with a proposition for the three tribes; and the Book of Estimates shows that it was sent in as one item, and there is no question about its being one amendment. I am perfectly willing to raise the point on the various paragraphs as they come along, if that is desired.

Mr. WALSH. As I understand the Senator from Kansas, he is not raising the point of order now, until the amendment which I have tendered has been considered.

Mr. CURTIS. Not if that is intended as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. It is.

Mr. CURTIS. As an amendment to the amendment. So we will consider it all after it is acted upon. I have no objection to that amendment going in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be agreed to, without objection.

Mr. SMOOT. The Secretary has not concluded the reading of the amendment as yet.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the amendment as above set forth.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I make the point of order on the amendment as amended, on the ground that it is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the following facts:

First. This amendment covers irrigation projects for three separate and distinct Indian tribes on three separate and distinct Indian reservations.

Second. It arranges for the charges against each acre of irrigable land.

Third. It provides for the payment of the charges.

Fourth. It provides for the distribution of the tribal funds in the Treasury in partial reimbursement.

Fifth. The reimbursement of the cost of construction is provided for, and it stops further reimbursement from tribal funds and extends the time of payment in addition.

Sixth. It provides for additional conditions upon the entrymen of the surplus lands.

Seventh. It arranges for the purchase of Indian allotments upon the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Eighth. It provides for the payment of proportionate costs by settlers on the surplus lands.

Ninth. It amends and construes the act of 1898.

Tenth. It changes the general allotment act of 1898.

Eleventh. It provides for the payment of the superintendent by the allottee, entrymen, and purchasers.

Twelfth. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to bring a suit.

Thirteenth. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to declare the area of land which may be irrigated.

Fourteenth. It provides that the work to be done and the amount to be expended shall be turned over to the Reclamation Service, thereby taking the matter out of the hands of the Indian Office and putting it into the hands of the Reclamation Service.

Fifteenth. The amendment offered and agreed to as an amendment to the amendment is admitted in the letter of transmittal to be general legislation.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me for a moment? I have to leave the Chamber. I wish to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the point of order was sustained to the language on page 39, beginning with line 11 and ending with line 18 on page 40.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, in addition to all of these objections, this question came up in the Senate on June 22, 1914, in the form of separate items covering in part the same project; that is, the project covered in the proviso of one section. The point of order was made upon those amendments, and the Vice President, Mr. MARSHALL, sustained the point of order. The Chair will find it in the RECORD on page 10835, and on page 52 of the book of precedents. I should like to read just one provision:

> That the use of so much water as may be necessary to supply for domestic, stock-watering, and irrigation purposes, land allotted or to be allotted to Indians on the Flathead Reservation or set aside for administrative purposes within said reservation, is hereby reserved, and the failure of any individual Indian or Indians to make beneficial use of such water shall not operate in any manner to defeat his or her right thereto while said land is held in trust by the United States. All laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

This amendment does not provide for the repeal of laws in conflict, but it reserves the same rights and has the same effect.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a minute? I want to make a statement that I think will obviate further argument on the point of order. Will the Senator yield for a second to hear what I want to do?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CURTIS. I am perfectly willing to yield; certainly.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment be divided, so that each proposition contained in the amendment shall be voted upon separately. I ask this under rule 18:

> If the question in debate contains several propositions, any Senator may have the same divided, except a motion to strike out and insert, which shall not be divided.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I object to that. The various items are offered as a single amendment.

Mr. MYERS. But I ask that it be divided.

Mr. CURTIS. I am making a point of order on the amendment, and I have a right to be heard on that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana would have the right to have it divided when it came to a vote.

Mr. MYERS. But, Mr. President, it looks to me as though this is a good deal like the ruling of a court on a bill of complaint. Would not the plaintiff have a right to amend his complaint pending a decision? This point of order is made to the whole amendment. Would not I have a right, pending the ruling of the Chair on that point of order, to ask for a division of the question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ordinarily, in the Senate of the United States, this being a committee amendment, having been submitted by the chairman of the committee, and a point of order having been raised to it, the Chair would with great hesitancy rule that any other Senator might take it out of the hands of the committee and take charge of the bill.

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator from Kansas will pardon me, and the Senator from Montana will let me say a word, I need not and I do not pretend to conceal the fact that I am very heartily in favor of this amendment. I think it is a meritorious amendment; and while I do not arrogate to myself any great knowledge of the parliamentary procedure of this body, I think it is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I did not yield for a speech and would like to complete my remarks.

Mr. ASHURST. Of course, I will not interject my remarks now.

Mr. CURTIS. Then, if there is anything to be said in reply, I shall be glad to hear it.

The first point I make is that the amendment applies to three Indian tribes—the Blackfeet, the Flathead, and the Fort Peck. That is shown in the amendment. It applies to three separate and distinct Indian reservations in the State of Montana.

Second, on page 51, existing law is changed, because it provides that—

> On the 1st day of December after the announcement by the Secretary of the Interior of the construction charge the allottee, entryman, purchaser, or owner of such irrigable land which might have been furnished water for irrigation during the whole of the preceding irrigation season, from ditches actually constructed, shall pay to the superintendent of the reservation where the land is located, for deposit to the credit of the United States as a reimbursement of the appropriations made or to be made for construction of said irrigation systems, 5 per cent of the construction charge fixed for his land, as an initial installment, and shall pay the balance of the charge in 15 annual installments, the first 5 of which shall each be 5 per cent of the construction charge and the remainder shall each be 7 per cent of the construction charge.

That is a change in existing law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the general allotment act or the law with reference to these particular projects?

Mr. CURTIS. There is a general reclamation law in reference to these projects, I understand.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, no; the general reclamation law has no reference whatever——

Mr. CURTIS. I did not mean that. I meant it was a bill, a piece of general legislation, providing for the disposition of the Indian lands and the use of the money in putting in irrigation projects.

Furthermore, on page 52, it enables the Secretary of the Interior to extend the times of payment.

On the same page it provides a different method of disbursing and using the funds.

On the same page it provides for no further reimbursement, which is a change in existing law.

It also provides that a failure to make any two payments when due shall render the entry subject to cancellation, which is legislation.

It provides that—

> The purchaser of any Indian allotment to be irrigated by such systems, purchased upon approval of the Secretary of the Interior, before the charges against said allotment herein authorized shall have been paid, shall pay all the charges—

And so forth.

That changes the law in reference to the selling of Indian allotments.

On page 54, it amends section 15 of the act of 1898.

On page 55, it arranges for the payment by the entryman, which is a change in the payment.

It also amends the act of 1898.

It provides for the payment of the superintendent.

It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to bring a suit.

And the amendment that was offered to the amendment authorizes the purchase of certain Indian lands, which the Secretary says in his letter can not be done without legislation.

So there is no question in my mind that this amendment is subject to a point of order. In reply to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], I will argue the merits of this case, if necessary, later on.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I desire to be heard very briefly.

We should premise the discussion as to the point of order first by remembering that each and every provision of this amendment as it appears in the bill was estimated for. It is in the Book of Estimates. The department not only submitted its estimates for the particular and exact amounts that are set out in this amendment, but the Interior Department itself sent the language to Congress; and the committee has, with the exception of one word, I believe——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Suppose they did do that, and suppose it is general legislation: What business has it on an appropriation bill?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I was going to say, if the Chair will pardon me: First, it is estimated for; secondly, it is carrying out the spirit, the intent, and the purpose of a previous law on this subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is it amending it? Is it amending the previous law?

Mr. ASHURST. It amends it in some particulars.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me, it amends no general law at all. It amends the law applicable to this particular project. There is no general law that is modified by anything in this amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. I would not want to be understood as saying that it modified a general law. The Senator from Montana is quite correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What does the Senator from Montana define as a general law?

Mr. WALSH. The subject of general legislation is——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Somewhat hazy?

Mr. WALSH. Somewhat hazy, but in Gilfrey's Precedents, page 60, I find the following:

> The Century Dictionary says:
> "General legislation—that legislation which is applicable throughout the State generally, as distinguished from special legislation, which affects only particular persons or localities."

There is not a thing in this amendment that affects the States generally. It affects only this particular locality and these particular persons.

Mr. President, this whole subject of these Indian reclamation projects are subjects of special legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana think the definition he has read is a full definition of general legislation?

Mr. WALSH. I do not know any better place to go for a definition than to the dictionary. That is the dictionary definition, and in a work generally referred to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Suppose a law applicable to all the inhabitants of a State, would it be general legislation?

Mr. WALSH. No; if we had a law which was applicable to the entire State and we passed a special law which abrogated or modified that general act, we might very properly say it was general legislation. But, Mr. President, that is not the case at all. The project originated by virtue of appropriations made in the general Indian appropriation bills, and in the making of the various appropriations the bill proceeded to tell how the money was to be spent and how it was to be reimbursed. This amendment proposes now to make some changes in that special law applicable to that special project, made in just exactly the same character of a bill, as is the one which is now before us. Now, where would you go except in an appropriation bill to make the changes which originated in an appropriation bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does it affect the rights of parties granted under former laws?

Mr. WALSH. The former law provided——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not any opinion about it as yet.

Mr. WALSH. I am sure the Chair is asking for enlightenment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What the Chair is trying to get at is whether the former laws fixed the lien, say, on real estate, either owned by Indians or owned by white men, in a certain way, to a certain amount, and whether this is shifting the amount of the lien and changing it in other particulars.

Mr. WALSH. I do not know that I can say that it is shifting the lien. I will state the fact about the matter, as far as the Blackfeet Reservation is concerned. There is no one involved except Indians. That reservation has not been opened to settlement at all. That part of the amendment affecting the repayment of the fund is desired by the Indian Bureau. They take the position—and it is a very just one—that the burden of these reclamation projects should be borne by the lands that are actually benefited by the irrigation projects. Under the law as it has been heretofore the charge comes out of the general funds of the Indians. The change is made for the purpose of imposing it upon those lands alone that are benefited by the work of irrigation. The others are mere matters of detail; but that is the general result sought to be accomplished. However, I should say that, even though some one clause of this long amendment should be subject to a point of order, it would not lie against the whole amendment.

Mr. PAGE. May I ask whether the Senator from Montana regards the amendment as only one amendment or as several amendments?

Mr. WALSH. I quite agree with my colleague [Mr. MYERS] that Rule XVI is applicable to this, and that it may very properly be divided into the various propositions involved. I should rather have the amendment acted upon as a whole, because, I will say to the Senator from Vermont——

Mr. PAGE. I should like to know how the Senator gets along with the proposition where we commence and go through with the different projects, and then the very last words of the amendment are as follows:

> Provided, That not to exceed $19,575 of applicable appropriations made for the Flathead, Blackfeet, and Fort Peck irrigation projects shall be available for the maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles for official use upon the aforesaid irrigation projects.

That applies to all three projects. I do not see how you can sever them.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Senator tell me what page he is reading from?

Mr. PAGE. I refer to page 58, from line 7 to line 16. There may be some part of this amendment that I should think ought to be enacted into law, but I can not quite see how you can sever this long amendment. If the Senator will turn to the hearings on the appropriation bill, I think he will agree with me that it was introduced as one amendment and must be considered as one amendment and can not be subdivided, as is proposed by the Senator's colleague.

Mr. WALSH. I do not agree at all with the Senator from Vermont on that matter, but I was not discussing that phase of the question at all.

I insist, Mr. President, that by no possible definition of general legislation can this be so characterized.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I was right in my statement that the amendment changes the general law. I referred to the act of 1898, which is an act for the survey and allotment of lands now embraced within the limits of the Fort Peck Reservation in the State of Montana and the sale and disposal of all surplus lands and allotments. If I might call the Chair's attention to it——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is paying attention.

Mr. CURTIS. There is a provision which, I think, settles this question as to what is general legislation. I should like to read it to the Chair. We find it on page 60 of Gilfrey's Precedents of the United States Senate:

> "General," with reference to the subject matter of the statute, is synonymous with "public" and opposed to "private," but with reference to the extent of territory over which it is to operate is opposed to "local" * * * and means that the statute to which it applies operates throughout the whole of the territory subject to the legislative jurisdiction. * * * Further, when used in antithesis to "special" it means relating to all of a class instead of to men only of that class. * * * In deciding whether or not a given law is general, the purpose of the act and the objects on which it operates must be looked to. If these objects possess sufficient characteristics peculiar to themselves, and the purpose of the legislation is germane thereto, they will be considered as a separate class, and legislation affecting them will be general.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is laid down by the Supreme Court of Indiana, the Supreme Court of Michigan, the Supreme Court of Illinois, the Supreme Court of Tennessee, and is laid down and spoken of among law writers that a general law applies and operates uniformly upon all the members of any class of persons.

Mr. WALSH. I wish to invite the attention of the Chair to the history of the legislation.

Mr. CURTIS. Did I understand the Chair to rule on the point of order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Chair is not prepared to rule on this point; he is still in a hazy condition; but the Chair is clear on the proposition that it is not necessary that a law shall affect all the people of a State in order to be general, if it applies to them as a class. If it applies to any particular class of persons it is a general law, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. CURTIS. It applies to the three separate and distinct tribes of Indians, there is no doubt about that. It applies to three separate and distinct reservations there is no doubt.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But there is a further proposition.

Mr. CURTIS. It changes the general law that authorized the allotment of the lands and the sale of the surplus lands on the reservations, and affects the purchasers.

Then it provides a change of the law under which the irrigation system was put in by modifications, as admitted by the chairman of the committee, in reference to assessments, in reference to kinds of payment, the payment by the entrymen, in reference to the sale of allotments by the Indians; that is, it changes the general act, to which I called the attention of the Chair a few moment ago. It changes the mode of selling and authorizes the purchase of land, which the Indian Office says can not be done without legislation.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. May I have a ruling on my request to have the question divided?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana, if it ever gets to a vote, is entitled to have the amendment divided and have a vote upon the different parts of the amendment.

Mr. MYERS. May I express myself in just a word, please? The Senator from Kansas has made one ground of his point of order that it embraces three different tribes of Indians. To obviate and overcome that objection, I want to divide it into at least three questions, so that each question shall apply to one tribe of Indians.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no doubt about the rule. The Senator is entitled to have it divided if it comes to a vote, but the amendment has been submitted by the committee as a single amendment and the point of order is made, and unless the committee takes some further steps about it the Chair, if he ever does rule, will be compelled to rule on it as a whole.

Mr. ASHURST. If it will facilitate the proceedings whatever or be of any benefit in any way or assist in promoting action upon the amendment or removing the objection, I also ask that it be divided.

Mr. CURTIS. The chairman of the committee has no more right to ask that it be changed than I have, and I challenge his right. No one can authorize that to be done except a majority of the committee.

Mr. ASHURST. I have a right to ask it.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator has no authority.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment. There is no necessity to get excited. The chairman of the committee can withdraw the amendment and reintroduce it in such separate portions as he chooses, and we would get along just as well and get along agreeably.

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator from Kansas will pardon me, I do not think the Senator from Kansas wants to defeat it on a technicality if his refusal to agree to divide it would defeat it. The Senator is too broad-minded to want to defeat it on a technicality. If it can be saved by a division, I know the Senator would be glad to do it.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. Just a moment. I did not mean to offend the Senator or anybody else when I said I, too, urged to have it divided. I have no power to divide it, but by virtue of the position that I occupy as chairman of the committee I do think that if a division will clarify the situation, if a division will assist the Vice President in reaching a solution, if it will assist any Senator here, it ought to be divided.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The difficulty about it is that it is all in the air, and nobody can propose to divide it in any way but the Chair.

Mr. MYERS. It is a committee amendment, and the rule says that any Senator may demand that an amendment shall be divided.

The VICE PRESIDENT. For what purpose?

Mr. MYERS. For a vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair——

Mr. MYERS. One of the objections of the Senator from Kansas is that it embraces three subjects. I want to divide it into three.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The only person who is going to vote on that is the Chair.

Mr. MYERS. I ask for the ruling of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that the Senator is not entitled to have it divided for the purpose of a ruling upon the point of order.

Mr. MYERS. It will be too late after the point of order is sustained.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not sustained it yet. The Chair has gone this far. The mind of the Chair is clear that it is not necessary that a bill shall be applicable to all the people of a State in order to be general legislation. If it applies to any particular class of people it is general legislation. But that does not determine the question in the particular condition of this amendment as to whether the Chair shall sustain it or not, because the Committee on Indian Affairs is making an appropriation for Indian purposes and the question the Chair is not clear about is as to whether the terms and conditions of the appropriation are such as to render the legislation general rather than an appropriation for these particular Indian purposes.

Mr. WALSH. Before the Chair finally rules on that, if the Senator from Kansas will permit me, I desire to address myself to that feature.

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly; I yield the floor to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, there is not anyone who would contend that legislation in order to be general and to be understood as general legislation shall affect all the people of a State nor indeed all the people of any subdivision of a State. A law may be made that will be applicable only to banking, and, of course, it would be general legislation. A law may be enacted that applies only to people living in cities of 5,000 inhabitants and it is general legislation. That really, as it seems to me, does not help us in the solution of the matter now before us.

The meat of this proposed legislation contemplates the making of appropriations to carry on three Indian irrigation projects in the State of Montana, projects which have been authorized by past legislation of Congress and that are now continued a long way toward completion at very great expense. All these appropriations, Mr. President, were made through the annual Indian appropriation acts.

I must say in this connection also, Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. If it will help any, the Chair is of the opinion that an appropriation can be made; but is there anything in the act that changes the general law?

Mr. WALSH. I say that there is no general law whatever which is applicable to it. Every law that there is on the subject is a special law; and I desire, if I may be permitted to proceed, to call the attention of the Chair to the history of the legislation.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the act of 1898, which is amended in several particulars by the proposed amendment. The act of 1908 is the general allotment act.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator will, of course, point out the general legislation which is affected. I have not heard him do so yet.

Mr. President, take the Blackfeet project, which was authorized under the provisions of the act of 1907—and this is a general Indian appropriation act, passed in accordance with a bill introduced, substantially similar to that which is now being considered by the Senate—which reads as follows. I read from page 1025, volume 34, Statutes at Large:

> That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to immediately cause to be surveyed all of the lands embraced within the limits of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation in the State of Montana.
> That so soon as all the lands embraced within the said Blackfeet Indian Reservation shall have been surveyed, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall cause allotments of the same to be made, under the provisions of the allotment laws of the United States, to all persons having tribal rights or holding tribal relations and who may rightfully belong on said reservation.

You will observe, Mr. President, that even the matter of making allotments to Indians on this reservation is the subject of a special act; it does not come under any general legislation at all except that the general legislation is referred to as defining the manner in which the allotments shall be made. Then follows the provision concerning the amount of land each is to take, and the act continues:

> Provided, That the Indians and the settlers on the surplus land, in the order named, shall have a preference right for one year from the date of the President's proclamation opening the reservation to settlement to appropriate the waters of the reservation which shall be filed on and appropriated under the laws of the State of Montana by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on behalf of the Indians taking irrigable allotments and by the settlers under the same law. At the expiration of the one year aforesaid the irrigation system constructed and to be constructed shall be operated under the laws of the State of Montana, and the title to such systems as may be constructed under this act, until otherwise provided by law, shall be in the Secretary of the Interior in trust for the said Indians, and he may sue and be sued in matters relating thereto: And provided further, That the ditches and canals of such irrigation systems may be used, extended, or enlarged for the purpose of conveying water by any person, association, or corporation under and upon compliance with the provisions of the laws of the State of Montana: And provided further, That when said irrigation systems are in successful operation the cost of operating the same shall be equitably apportioned upon the lands irrigated, and, when the Indians have become self-supporting, to the annual charge shall be added an amount sufficient to pay back into the Treasury the cost of the work done in their behalf within 30 years, suitable deduction being made for the amounts received from the disposal of the lands within the reservation aforesaid: Provided, That the right to the use of water acquired under the provisions of the act shall be appurtenant to the land irrigated, and beneficial use shall be the basis, the measure, and the limit of right—

And so on.

Now, there is the special act under which this particular work was undertaken. Then, Mr. President, in each succeeding annual appropriation bill——

The VICE PRESIDENT. If it will not disturb the Senator from Montana, the Chair understands the Senator from Kansas claims there is a general act applicable to all these reservations.

Mr. CURTIS. I do not say there is a general act in regard to the Blackfeet Reservation, but as to the Fort Peck and the Flathead Reservations there are general acts, and I have them before me.

Mr. WALSH. Why, Mr. President, the Senator, if he has any such idea, is altogether in error about the matter. I am referring to the Blackfeet legislation as characteristic of the legislation with reference to these three reservations. I have the whole Flathead Reservation legislation right here. It follows exactly the same line, and I will be glad to take it up and read it for you, and give you the history of it, if you care to have it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair wants to hear the Senator from Montana, if he cares to be heard, but he does not care to prolong the discussion, unless it is necessary. The Chair understood from the Senator from Kansas that there was a general law, not with reference to the Blackfeet or the other Indian tribes, but a general law applicable to all the tribes.

Mr. WALSH. There is nothing of the kind, Mr. President; there is no general law applicable to Indian irrigation projects.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the act of May 30, 1898.

Mr. WALSH. I will be glad to listen.

Mr. CURTIS. It is chapter 237, and is entitled "An act for the survey and allotment of lands now embraced within the limits of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and the sale and disposal of all the surplus lands after allotment." That is a general act.

Mr. WALSH. Let me inquire what does the Senator mean by "general act"? That act applies especially—it applies only to the Fort Peck Indian Reservation; it does not apply to the Indian reservations in the State of Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, no; of course not.

Mr. WALSH. It does not apply to all reservations in the State of Montana.

Mr. CURTIS. But it applies to all Indians claiming a right on the Fort Peck Reservation. It allots their lands; it provides for the selling of their surplus; it provides for entrymen paying a fee; it provides for putting in irrigation ditches; it provdes how they shall be paid for. It is a general act, and not an appropriation act at all.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, successive acts, then, make the appropriation for the purpose of carrying on this work. The provision in Thirty-fifth Statutes at Large, at page 793, reads:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to complete the survey, allotment, classification, and appraisement of the lands in the Blackfeet Reservation——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, does the Senator want to conclude this evening the matter he is now discussing?

Mr. WALSH. I think, probably, we have reached the time when we usually discontinue, and I should be very glad to suspend.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, March 25, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 24, 1916.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, infinite Spirit, our Father in heaven, that we may come to Thee in prayer and be strengthened, purified, ennobled by the touch of Infinity, for we realize that no man is sufficient unto himself, however intellectual, for if his work lives it must be reenforced by moral and spiritual energy drawn from the fountain of life, as illustrated in the life of our Washington and Lincoln. Hence we pray for moral strength, spiritual energy, which will keep us in touch with Thee, that our lives may be worthy and our work acceptable, exemplified in the life, character, and work of Him who taught us to pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 182.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 10384 (with the amendments reported by the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization); that the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with; that there shall be seven hours' general debate, to be equally divided between those favoring and those opposing the bill; that while the bill is under consideration the House shall meet at 11 o'clock a. m., and the bill shall be in order on all legislative days except Calendar Wednesday; that when general debate is commenced it shall be concluded before the House shall adjourn for that legislative day. At the expiration of general debate the bill shall be considered under the five-minute rule, and the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union shall perfect and report the same to the House, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I wish not exactly to make a parliamentary inquiry, possibly, but to get a little advice from the Speaker. The suggested rule proposes seven hours' general debate, and then says, practically, that the debate shall be finished on this legislative day. Suppose the House should adjourn before the seven hours of debate are concluded, would that end the general debate?

Mr. POU. Does the gentleman think that after the adoption of the rule the House could adjourn before the conclusion of the general debate?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I think the House can adjourn whenever it pleases. No adoption of any rule can prevent the House adjourning if it wants to.

Mr. POU. If the House should decide to adjourn, I imagine that would cut off the general debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if the House in its wisdom concludes to adjourn at any time this afternoon, under this rule that will be the end of the general debate.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. If I understand this rule correctly, it will dispense with the regular order of business and postpone consideration of bills on the Private Calendar for to-day. Is that correct?

Mr. MANN. It certainly would, unless they came up after the general debate on the immigration bill was concluded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Then I ask unanimous consent that bills upon the Private Calendar that would be in order under the rules to-day be in order following the completion of the immigration bill as provided in this rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] asks unanimous consent that bills on the Private Calendar which would be in order to-day shall be in order immediately after the completion of the consideration of this immigration bill, unless that happens to fall on Wednesday.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that there are three general appropriation bills now on the calendar awaiting disposal, and two more will be reported before the expiration of next week. Under these circumstances I intend to object to the consideration of every class of business that I can object to while appropriation bills are under consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman objecting now?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I hope the gentleman will reserve his objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will reserve it in order to allow the gentleman to make a statement.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I am authorized by the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions to say that he has no desire to interfere with the consideration of more important bills upon the calendar, or with the plans of the leaders of the House in charge of those bills. It will probably take an hour to dispose of the pension bills, and if we can not get unanimous consent to follow the completion of the immigration bill, we shall hope at least that the House will permit us to have our day two weeks hence to consider the two bills that will then be upon the calendar.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri and of the House to the fact that if we devote our time to the appropriation bills and dispose of them, there will be ample time afterwards to dispose of legislation of the character described by the gentleman from Missouri, and at the same time enable Congress to adjourn early. If we defer action upon the appropriation bills we will so string out this session that we will not get away from here until fall. I for one propose to exercise my right in the interest of getting Congress adjourned by the first of July if possible. [Applause.] I hope the objections will not be considered offensive, but I intend to make objections to every character of business that will in any way delay or interfere with the adjournment of Congress.

Mr. POU. I understand this is all by unanimous consent. I do not want to yield the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not yielded the floor. The Chair will protect the gentleman from North Carolina in his rights.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I want to submit a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will submit it.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent that bills reported by the Invalid Pensions Committee——

Mr. MANN. And the Pensions Committee.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Yes; the Pensions and Invalid Pensions Committees be in order to-morrow night beginning at 8 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] asks unanimous consent that bills which would be in order to-day—bills from the Pensions Committee and the Invalid Pensions Committee—be disposed of to-morrow night at a night session.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I ask that the House take a recess at 5 o'clock until 8 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that to-morrow at 5 o'clock p. m. the House shall take a recess until 8 o'clock and sit until 11 o'clock if necessary to dispose of bills——

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. At the suggestion of my friend from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] I ask that the recess be taken at 5.30 instead of 5 o'clock. The gentleman from Alabama wants to continue consideration of the immigration bill until 5.30.

The SPEAKER. That to-morrow afternoon at 5.30 the House shall stand in recess until 8 o'clock and run not later than 11, the evening session to be devoted to consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I object.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DAVIS], under leave to print, published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech, beginning on page 5344, which ought not to be in the records of Congress. It is indecent, unjustifiable, and ought to be expunged from the records of the House. I move to strike the speech from the RECORD.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I demand——

Mr. MADDEN. It is a speech criticizing Members of the House, using language that is indecent, not spoken in debate, washing dirty linen connected with some quarrel in Texas, using the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a cesspool for vile epithets, and using language that would not be published in any newspaper in the United States; and I contend that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD ought not to be permitted to be used for purposes that would not be tolerated in any decent publication in America, and language that would be libelous if used anywhere else.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to expunge from the RECORD the speech of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURNETT. Is this a matter of higher privilege than the rule reported by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU]? If not, I object to its being taken up at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is a question of high privilege.

Mr. BURNETT. Is it of higher privilege than the rule? And if not, I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. It would seem to the Chair so at first blush.

Mr. GARRETT rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee rise?

Mr. GARRETT. I rise to suggest——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that a committee of the House be appointed to investigate the language of this speech and report whether or not it ought to be expunged from the RECORD.

Mr. GARRETT. That is what I was about to suggest, Mr. Speaker. I have not read the speech, do not know anything about it, and do not care anything about it. There has been one occasion before during my service where a matter of this kind arose and a committee was appointed. I refer to the Willett case.

The SPEAKER. There have been three cases, I think, during the gentleman's term of service.

Mr. GARRETT. The Willett case was referred to a committee to investigate and report.

Mr. MADDEN. I make a motion that a committee of five be appointed to investigate it.

Mr. GARRETT. Can not it be referred to a standing committee?

Mr. MADDEN. I am willing that it should go to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, the precedents heretofore have been to refer it to a special committee appointed by the Chair, and it occurs to me that that would be the wiser course—to refer it to a special committee for the purpose of investigating the speech to see whether or not it is proper to remain in the RECORD.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas ask for recognition?

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I want to know under what rules the House proposes to act in regard to this matter and if I will be apprised and have notice of what rights I am entitled to as a Member of this House.

The SPEAKER. The House will act under the general practice of the House and under the general rules of the House. The Chair will explain to the gentleman that if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] stood on his first resolution to expunge it from the RECORD, the matter would come up immediately. If it follows the practice, so far as the Chair recollects since he has been here, to appoint a committee to investigate it, which was done on three different occasions, then the gentleman can appear before the committee either in person or by counsel.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Very well. I thank you.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, the precedents, as I have looked them up in two of the three cases last disposed of similar to this, were by special committees. In one a motion was made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], and it was immediately voted upon. Another was the Hopkins case, in which the Chair appointed a committee of three, and the other was the Willett case, in which the Chair appointed a committee of five.

The SPEAKER. And there is another case, the case of Mr. Lilley, of Connecticut.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that a committee of five be appointed by the Chair to investigate the language of this speech and report whether it should remain in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the Chair appoint a committee of five to investigate this matter and make a report to the House.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER subsequently appointed the following committee: Mr. WEBB, Mr. BARKLEY, Mr. MONTAGUE, Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, and Mr. PLATT.

IMMIGRATION.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, it was agreed between the members of the Committee on Rules that the debate on the rule should be limited to 20 minutes on a side, at the end of which time the previous question shall be considered as ordered, and I ask unanimous consent to that effect.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that debate on the rule be limited to 20 minutes on a side, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]; that at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to submit a question to the gentleman from North Carolina. I notice that the rule provides for seven hours' debate. It also provides that when general debate is commenced it shall be concluded before the House adjourns on that legislative day. There is no question in my mind that it will be absolutely impossible to-day to avail ourselves of the number of hours provided for in this resolution. Therefore I am going to ask the gentleman whether he is not willing to strike out that provision.

Mr. POU. No; I can not strike it out, but I will say to the gentleman that he will get his half of the seven hours.

Mr. SABATH. Is it agreed that we will get seven hours' general debate? I want to say to the gentleman that I have promised all the time to various gentlemen.

Mr. POU. The gentleman will get his time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, this matter has been before the House so many times that there is very little disposition to discuss this rule on the part of the majority members of the Rules Committee. In our desire to expedite the business of this House it is provided that general debate be concluded on this legislative day. So far as I am concerned I have no desire to discuss the merits of the Burnett bill further than to say that no human being can tell what will be the result of the present great conflict in Europe. We do not know whether immigration will come pouring into this country or not. If there shall be an influx of undesirable immigration, this bill will have the tendency to check it. If there is no immigration at all, as some predict, then no harm can result from the passage of the Burnett bill. In any event, those of us who are supporting the rule and who are in favor of the Burnett bill have felt that it is a wise and necessary precaution to take at this time. For that reason we have presented the rule providing that general debate on the measure shall be concluded in one legislative day.

Mr. Speaker, I am heartily for the bill and could say a great deal more, but having, I hope, made my position clear, I am content to leave the discussion to gentlemen who know very much more about the question of immigration in general than I.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, the acting chairman of the Committee on Rules [Mr. POU] has just stated that it was the desire of the majority members of that committee to expedite the business of the House. A statement of similar import was made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I will state to both of these gentlemen that the minority members of the Committee on Rules have found it necessary to take hold of the business of the House in order to get it out of the hopeless condition into which it has fallen and endeavor in every way the minority Members can to aid the House in doing the work that it must do before it adjourns.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What have they done?

Mr. CAMPBELL. They will insist, however, that all of the business of the House shall be transacted.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What have the minority Members done to help expedite the business of this House?

Mr. CAMPBELL. They have agreed to seven hours of general debate upon this rule, and they have further agreed just now that there should be only 20 minutes of debate on a side on the rule.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But I guess the minority Members could not help either one of those agreements.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I know the gentleman wants to be perfectly fair. I desire to illustrate the way in which they have helped expedite the business of the House. The suggestion was made upon the Democratic side that debate be limited to four hours, but objection to that came from the Republican side.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The gentleman can not disclose what takes place in the committee room.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. POU. It must not be started on that side.

Mr. BENNET. If we start that sort of thing, we can remain here for some time stating what takes place in committee rooms.

The SPEAKER. The matter is not debatable.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, this is a fair rule and gives the House an opportunity to dispose of one of the great questions that the rule brings before the House to-day. There is nothing more important than the consideration of the immigration bill. As stated by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU], no one knows what the conditions of immigration will be at the close of the European war. This country must take every step that is necessary to protect itself by regulating further the character of the immigration that shall come to it. It has that right and it owes itself that duty. The bill made in order by this rule will give the House an opportunity to take into consideration rules and regulations further governing immigration into the country.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that for once I can agree with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], that the rule reported is a fair one. I have no fault to find with the rule or with the provisions thereof, but I do object to its being brought in at this time.

I feel satisfied that if the Committee on Rules and the membership of the House were thoroughly familiar with conditions as they exist to-day they would realize that it is not necessary to urge the passage of the immigration bill at this time.

I am inclined to believe that the Committee on Rules has been imposed upon and made to believe that this legislation is necessary. I have been told by several Members of this House within the past few days that we have no immigration legislation at the present time, and that they are in favor of some kind of a bill.

This ridiculous report has been spread broadcast, and, consequently, the general public and the membership of this House have been misled.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that we have strict immigration laws at the present time—laws that are more stringent than those of any other country.

Under our present law we exclude all of the undesirable aliens, and for the information and enlightenment of the House I will read a part of section 2 of the present law, which will speak for itself:

SEC. 2. That the following classes of aliens shall be excluded from admission into the United States: All idiots, imbeciles, feeble-minded persons, epileptics, insane persons, and persons who have been insane within five years previous; persons who have had two or more attacks of insanity at any time previously; paupers; persons likely to become a public charge; professional beggars; persons afflicted with tuberculosis or with a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease; persons not comprehended within any of the foregoing excluded classes who are found to be and are certified by the examining surgeon as being mentally or physically defective, such mental or physical defect being of a nature which may affect the ability of such alien to earn a living; persons who have been convicted of or admit having committed a felony or other crime or misdemeanor involving mortal turpitude; polygamists, or persons who admit their belief in the practice of polygamy; anarchists, or persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States, or of all government, or of all forms of law, or the assassination of public officials; prostitutes, or women or girls coming into the United States for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose; persons who are supported by or receive in whole or in part the proceeds of prostitution; persons who procure or attempt to bring in prostitutes or women or girls for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose; persons hereinafter called contract laborers who have been induced or solicited to migrate to this country by offers or promises of employment or in consequence of agreements, oral, written or printed, expressed or implied, to perform labor in this country of any kind, skilled or unskilled; those who have been, within one year from the date of application for admission to the United States, deported as having been induced or solicited to migrate as above described; any person whose ticket or passage is paid for with the money of another, or who is assisted by others to come, unless it is affirmatively and satisfactorily shown that such person does not belong to one of the foregoing excluded classes and that said ticket or passage was not paid for by any corporation, association, society, municipality, or foreign Government, either directly or indirectly; all children under 16 years of age unaccompanied by one or both of their parents. * * *

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of this House, do you not think that this is drastic enough? Can anyone point out any other class that should be added to the excluded classes already mentioned?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to yield a few minutes more.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I will yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I will also grant the gentleman two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, our present exclusion laws adequately provide against the admission of undesirables, and in connection therewith I desire to say that these laws have been strictly enforced by the Department of Labor and the Bureau of Immigration. As a result of this action on the part of the Government, the steamship companies have been very careful in admitting passengers to their vessels for transportation to the United States. In 1915 only 326,000 immigrants entered this country, and of those who came 24,111 were debarred. From this you will see that we not only have stringent laws, but that they are stringently enforced. Not only this, but the present law gives the Secretary of Labor and the Bureau of Immigration the power to deport any alien who is found to have become a public charge, who has been here in violation of law, who has been charged with a crime involving moral turpitude, or who has been guilty of the violation of many of the provisions of the present immigration law, within a period of three years from the date of landing in the United States. During the last year 2,670 such aliens were deported as having been found undesirable.

So you see, gentlemen, that these reports which have been circulated, declaring that there is an imperative need for immigration legislation, are unfounded and unjustifiable.

I have previously said that our present immigration laws are stronger and more stringent than the laws of any other nation, and that therefore there is no need of this bill or a like bill to keep out the undesirable classes of immigrants, as the present law is effectively doing so.

Mr. Speaker, I realize that there are certain organizations, and even patriotic lodges, which have been circulating unfounded rumors in an effort to make the Members of this House believe that there is a country-wide demand for this legislation. I want to assure the membership that this is not a fact. There are some organizations which call themselves patriotic and there are some labor organizations which are being misled by these so-called patriotic organizations or societies into advocating the passage of this bill, but they will in time realize that they are committing a grave mistake in urging and demanding this proposed legislation. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. POU. Will the gentleman from Kansas use some of his time?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] is recognized for 14 minutes.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to my colleague Mr. FITZGERALD.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, there are certain provisions of the immigration bill which I favor; there are some to which I am heartily opposed. Regardless of my attitude toward the bill, however, I am opposed to the adoption of this rule. It seems to me to be indefensible to propose to consider at this time legislation for which there is no actual necessity or any really imperative demand. The country is demanding action upon measures pending before this House and of vital importance, and the House should devote itself to the consideration of those measures, giving such full opportunity for their consideration as will result beneficially when the legislation is perfected.

I was somewhat amused at the statement of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] that the minority of the Committee on Rules was compelled to take control and help shape things in this House. Unless I be mistaken, the gentleman from Kansas is in favor of the immigration bill. He intends to support it. He is in favor of this rule. He is in favor of bringing legislation into the House, unnecessary at this time, to use the time of the House so as to exclude from consideration business of much more importance and more imperatively needed. He is anxious, while pretending to expedite the business of the House, to have it so delayed that the appropriation bills will not be enacted into law before the 1st of July.

I have known members of the minority to have the same high ideals and patriotic motives publicly as the gentleman from Kansas, while privately they were proceeding to cooperate for a very different purpose. I wish to say to this side of the House that whatever our personal desires or beliefs regarding legislation may be, that we should demonstrate to the country our willingness to take up legislation that must be disposed of, demonstrate our capacity to dispose of it expeditiously, and try to adjourn the Congress at as early a day as possible. If we do this, if we put aside for the time being measures which are not imperatively required or demanded, we can complete the important business pending before the House within a reasonable time. But if we are to be diverted from the consideration of essential legislation for the consideration of bills that are not essential at this time, then the House will not be able to complete its labors within the time the country expects and demands. I simply express the hope that bills of this character will not be brought in, and I especially warn the Members of this side of the House not to expect any assistance of the gentleman from Kansas and those like him, if this is the manner in which it is to be rendered. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, the rule which is now before the House for consideration providing for the taking up of the immigration bill is one which is fair and which is liberal. There has been a demand for several years, and there is now throughout the country, for some kind of further legislation looking to the restriction of immigration. Like my friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], who has just spoken, I am for expediting the public business, and I believe that this House should put in its time in trying to pass legislation that is necessary and that has been demanded by the people throughout the country. I would like to go home at an early date, as do many other Members of this House, and I believe we ought to endeavor to adjourn at as early a date as possible; but I believe that this side of the House desires to remain here until legislation has been passed which the Democratic Party has advocated, and this side of the House is willing to take a little longer time, if necessary, to do that and pass legislation we have told the people we would enact into law when we came into power.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But this bill was never pledged by the Democratic Party?

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to my friend from New York I did not say this was pledged by the Democratic Party and did not have in mind this particular bill, but I mean other matters that as a party we stand for.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then, why not take up what we did pledge to do and not what we have not promised?

Mr. FOSTER. In due time, let me say to the gentleman from New York, we hope to do that, and we ought to do it just as speedily as possible.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question——

Mr. FOSTER. I will.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I would like to ask my colleague whom he means by his remark that there is a demand for it; whom did we promise?

Mr. FOSTER. I did not mean to say as a party we had promised this legislation, as it is not a party question. I will say that there are those who are opposed to this legislation—and I give every man who opposes this legislation just as much credit for honesty, integrity, and patriotism as the men who favor it—but I do say to my colleague, as has been demonstrated in this House on former occasions, that a large majority of the membership of this House favors the restriction of immigration into this country and they will, when the vote is taken this time, say that they are still for restriction. Now, I will say to my friend from New York that I am with him, and will stand with him, in expediting the public business, but I am not ready to run home until we have enacted the measures for which we stand, and I know we all feel the same way about that. There is no question about it. The gentleman from New York works hard. No Member of this House is more industrious than the gentleman from New York, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in his endeavors to expedite business by passing appropriation bills, but it seems to me that the gentleman from New York must remember that when a large majority of this House, without regard to party, stand for a measure that the House has a right to consider it, which we have in this case. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the Members of this House ought to be fair with the House. Notwithstanding the criticisms of the cheap paragraphers throughout the country, this is a hard-working body. Notwithstanding the numerous contentions set up by lobbyists and others, no man works harder nor respects less the eight-hour rule than the average Member of Congress. There is no earthly reason why we should be forced to do business here in this irregular way. We began this session in December, and if all signs are not awry, we probably will remain here until next September. There is no good excuse for this delay nor for forcing us to do business under a rule.

I say, the House ought to be fair to itself. There is no reason why we should begin to hold night sessions. We have had plenty of time to do business since December last. I objected a moment ago to a night session, because I think it is unfair to the individual Member. Why should we all be worked up into a state of nervous prostration every two or three days, and lay aside all the regular business, in order to take up some splurge legislation, because, perchance, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], or some other gentleman, has on his desk a stack of petitions to press forward a certain bill? We understand where these petitions originate. The immigration bill will be reached in the regular way, and it ought to be, and this business of constantly resorting to a rule to push forward special bills that should be deliberately considered ought to be disregarded. This is an important bill, to be sure. It involves very important questions. It is a bill that stirs up racial hatred. It is a bill that stirs up party and personal strife. It is a bill that involves international relations, and it ought to be considered; but I hope it will not be forced upon us under a rule. I hope the rule will be defeated so that the bill may come up when it is reached in the regular order.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] that we have but one more speech on this side.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] a moment ago exhibited a good deal of anxiety about getting appropriation bills through this House. It is now the 24th of March, and none of the regular appropriation bills has yet been enacted into law. One small deficiency bill has become a law. The gentleman from New York now insists upon passing the appropriation bills so Congress may adjourn during the middle of the summer. What will he do with the administration program for further legislation? On the question of preparedness there is yet another bill to pass the House. There is the question of raising revenue to pay the running expenses of the Government in time of peace, to say nothing about the expenses of preparedness. There is the antidumping law, a sort of protective-tariff measure; the ship-purchase bill; the Philippine freedom bill; the Porto Rican bill, giving a larger degree of self-government to Porto Rico; the tariff-commission bill; the Mississippi River permanent-improvement measure; amendments to the corrupt-practice act; conservation measures; rural credit legislation; and some other measures, all in addition to the appropriation bills. Does the gentleman ignore the necessity of carrying out the administration program?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am in favor of considering the legislation the administration wishes considered at this time. Will the gentleman help to facilitate the consideration of those measures?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The minority members of the committee have been endeavoring to expedite the business of the House in every way possible. We help you all we can, but we want you to help yourselves. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER].

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] considers this a very important measure. I believe it is one of the most useless propositions that we ever wasted the time of the House with. [Applause.] It is not necessary, and it is uncalled for, and I have to differ with my colleague from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] when he says that there is a great demand by the people for this legislation. I deny it. There may be a demand on the part of certain organizations, but not on the part of the people. The fact is that you are proposing to legislate to prohibit immigration that is practically prohibited now. There is little or no immigration at present. Still you are wasting the time of this House over a proposition to prevent immigration.

Now, the chairman of the Immigration Committee said that no one could tell what the immigration is going to be after the war. I agree with him, and therefore we ought to wait until after the war to consider it and then pass legislation to regulate immigration. I want to say to my manufacturing friends and men in business, and those representing the farmers, that it would be a peculiar state of affairs if after the war we had no immigration at all to this country.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, have I five minutes remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], my colleague on the Committee on Rules, said that merely a small minority of this country is opposed to his proposition. He is a Democrat; I am a Republican. His party in national convention did not put a single line in their 1912 platform about the restriction of immigration. Mine advocated the restriction of immigration. His party ran first, mine ran third, so far as there has been any evidence on this question recently that indicates what the people of the United States want. [Applause.]

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. I can not. I have but five minutes.

Not only is this bill useless, but it does two very deleterious things. I was one of the conferees, of whom there were four Republicans, that had to do with the political end of it in 1907, when we passed the present law. And I know why we put in the provision in relation to Japanese labor, and I know that we put it into the statute at the request of the Secretary of State.

I have read this bill, and I want to say, with the responsibility of knowledge, that if you pass this bill unamended in its present form we will be in war inside of six months. Do you think that the raid of Villa over the line at Columbus, N. Mex., was an accident? Do you think he went over there for anything trivial? If you do, you have not kept track of recent history.

What does it do with respect to our official policy? We welcome the oppressed. Let us take one class that we are barring out. When this war started there were 2,000,000 Armenians. There has been massacred by the Turks 800,000, and of those 1,200,000 that remain many have friends here that would welcome them into this country.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. BENNET. I can not yield. I promised to yield to one gentleman, and I decline to yield to anybody else. If this bill goes through unamended, we prevent the Armenians in this country from rescuing those 1,200,000, or any portion of them.

Those people over there are starving. Every Christian Armenian church in all the Ottoman Empire is gone, and yet we bring this bill up at this time for that purpose.

Mr. Speaker, I traveled as a member of the Immigration Commission, as did my friend from Alabama Mr. BURNETT, in Europe, through the Jewish pale that has been ravaged by this war five times, and I see now that the Russians are going over that devastated, desolated region again at Czernowitz. If this bill passes unamended, 25 per cent of those refugees from Poland, that according to all the great traditions of our free America ought to be let in here, will be barred out, because that is about the proportion that can not read; and although there is an attempt at exemption of those people—a piece of favoritism to the Hebrew people—if the bill is not amended that favoritism will not be worth a snap of the finger.

That is the kind of a bill we are taking up, and taking it up at a time when the immigrating peoples are being killed far more rapidly than they ever immigrated to this country.

What was the net immigration in 1915? Roughly speaking, it was something like 3,000. It will be 10 or 15 years after this war before we have something like normal immigration, and for the first two or three years after the war there will be more people going out of this country to look up friends and estates and matters abroad than will come in. There is no need of haste about this matter. I do not know how much time it will take; two or three days, possibly. I am not particularly concerned about two or three days, I will be frank to say, but I am concerned to have the Congress of the United States take up a matter so full of menace, so full of possibilities of stirring up race and religious hatreds at a time when we ought to be united, as we were practically united in this House yesterday, when a vote for national preparedness was taken, 402 against 2. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. Does the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] want to use his time?

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] is recognized for six minutes.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, there never was an opportune time to take up this bill, in the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] and in the opinion of the other opponents of the bill. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET], who has just spoken, undertook to scare the House by talking about wars and rumors of wars if this bill is passed. He forgets, Mr. Speaker, that we have a President who, during the last three years, has steered the ship of state safely between Scylla and Charybdis, and no war has ever yet come.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. BURNETT. No; I can not yield. I will not yield during the six minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama declines to yield.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] has just intimated that the reason why the candidate of his choice, Hon. William Howard Taft, ran third in the presidential race of 1912 was due to the fact that his platform contained a restriction plank, while those of President Wilson and Col. Roosevelt said nothing about restriction. He declares that, "so far as there has been any evidence on this question recently," the result of the vote of 1912 "indicates what the people of the United States want."

The gentleman neglected to state that while President Taft had never declared himself in his annual messages on the subject, Col. Roosevelt, as President, again and again urged Congress to pass restrictive legislation, and particularly the reading and writing test, as well as an economic and other tests, propositions that, whatever he may have done in private, he has never publicly repudiated.

Likewise, the gentleman neglected to call attention to the official statement of the chairman of the Republican national campaign committee, Hon. Charles D. Hilles, who was also President Taft's secretary, issued in the gentleman's own city, New York City, October 21, 1912, and carried from coast to coast and border to border in all the morning dailies of October 22, 1912, just a fortnight previous to election, and which assured the country that President Taft had repudiated the restriction plank in his party platform and would veto the Burnett bill, then pending in the Senate, and which he did three months later. The statement was, in part, as follows:

VITAL ISSUE IN CAMPAIGN—THE DILLINGHAM-BURNETT BILL.

[By Charles D. Hilles, chairman Republican national committee.]

NEW YORK, October 21.

The Democratic candidate has not been able to explain away his "Know-Nothing" ideas concerning immigrants. Foreign-born voters really have a vital issue in the campaign * * *. The Dillingham-Burnett bill has been condemned by the German-American Alliance and other associations. Its chief provisions are still indorsed by another element. Dr. Wilson is looked to, if elected, to bring these immigration restrictions into operation with the help of a Democratic Congress.

Representative HENRY, of Texas, an apologist for Dr. Wilson and for Bryan, has said BURNETT would reintroduce the Dillingham bill in Congress. President Taft, if reelected, would positively prevent any such proposed legislation from becoming effective. He is not afraid to use the veto power, as he has shown in the instances of the Democratic popgun tariff bills. With Taft reestablished in the White House no straining for the limitation of immigration on any such lines as laid down in the Dillingham-Burnett bill and taught by Dr. Wilson will be tolerated. Reports from all parts of the United States show that President Taft will receive the active support of the army of foreign-born citizens.

There is the direct official assurance on the part of the secretary to President Taft and the official head of the gentleman's party that President Taft, if reelected, would veto the Burnett bill, and I submit that the gentleman's deductions are wrong.

I want next to call the attention of the House to President Woodrow Wilson's big speech on immigration during the campaign of 1912, delivered in New York City, from which place the gentleman hails, on September 4, 1912, and the extract from it that I quote was carried in the daily press of the country next day throughout the length and breadth of this land of ours. It is as follows:

If we can hit upon a standard which admits every voluntary immigrant and excludes those who have not come of their own motion, with their own purpose of making a home and a career here for themselves, but have been induced by steamship companies or others in order to pay the passage money, then we will have what we will all agree upon as Americans. I am speaking to you as also Americans with myself, and just as much American as myself, and if we all take the American point of view, namely, that we want American life kept to its standards, and that only the standards of American life shall be standards of restriction, then we are all upon a common ground, not of those who criticize immigration, but those who declare themselves Americans. I am not saying that I am wise enough out of hand to frame the legislation that will meet this idea. I am only saying that it is the ideal, and that is what we ought to hold ourselves to. * * * Of course, if the immigrants are allowed to come in uninstructed hosts and to stop at the ports where they enter and there to compete in an oversupplied labor market, there is going to be unhappiness, there is going to be deterioration, there is going to be everything that will be detrimental to the immigrant.

Then there was what President Wilson had written in his five-volume History of the American People in 1902, and with which, unquestionably, even the rank and file were more or less familiar. Among other things in that splendid history, the President wrote:

Throughout the country men of the sturdy stock of the north of Europe had made up the main strain of foreign blood which was every year added to the vital working force of the country, or else men of the Latin-Gaelic stock of France and northern Italy; but now there came multitudes of men of the lowest class * * * and men of the meaner sort, * * * men out of the ranks where there was neither skill nor energy, nor any initiative nor quick intelligence; and they came in numbers which increased from year to year, as if the countries of the south of Europe were disburdening themselves of the more sordid and hapless elements of their population, the men whose standards of life and work were such as American workmen had never dreamed of before.

Still further, with reference to the attitude of the people and their conception of who was in favor of rational restriction and the legislation in this very bill, it is interesting to note what is unfairly indicated in a news item that appeared in the New York Times and other big dailies on July 29, 1912, and from which I read the following:

The editors and publishers of the foreign-language newspapers in the United States have issued an address to their readers advocating the reelection of President Taft and condemning Gov. Wilson for his so-called attacks upon foreign-born Americans. The document is signed by 120 different newspaper publishers, representing 120 different newspaper publishers in foreign languages, saying: "President Taft has shown himself to be a friend of the immigrant, while Woodrow Wilson has publicly condemned all immigrants except the Chinese. President Taft has not only discouraged the enactment of laws for the unreasonable and unfair restriction of immigration, but on more than one occasion has conferred with representatives of the foreign-language press and with various committees. Our representatives have been welcomed at the White House, and their arguments against unreasonable and unjust restrictions upon the immigrant have always met with most favorable responses from the President. In strong contrast to President Taft's public acts and declarations is Woodrow Wilson's attitude toward our foreign-born population. * * *

"Woodrow Wilson is the foe of the laborer, as he is unfriendly to the immigrant. He has shown himself to possess no sympathy for the toiling masses."

The fact is that no party dares declare in its national platform against this needed legislation, and if I understand party declarations they are binding until publicly repudiated by the party. As far back as 1896 both parties went on record in their national platforms in favor of this kind of legislation, thus making it clearly a nonpartisan question, and those pledges to the workingmen of this country still remain unfulfilled, but are about to be and will be if this bill is only brought to a final determination, as I am confident it will be, this session of Congress and before election.

And now another final word with reference to the attitude of one of the presidential candidates of 1912. President Taft has written a letter to Congressman SIEGEL, which the gentleman from New York quotes, showing that President Taft is "of the same opinion still" that he was when he vetoed this bill at the suggestion of Secretary Nagel because it contained the reading test. In answer to that I merely wish to read a clipping from the Boston Journal of March 10, 1916, which is a still more recent expression of opinion on the part of Judge Taft with reference to the "readin' and writin'" test. It is as follows:

TAFT CALLS MEXICAN GOVERNMENT A JOKE.

SAUGUS, March 9.

"The Government in Mexico is a joke," said former President Taft in an address here to-night. "Revolutions are a regular business and Mexicans can not develop patriotism unless they have access to a customhouse. This condition is not to be wondered at, when it is considered that 80 per cent of the population can neither read nor write."

Mr. Speaker, if this bill had been in force for the last 15 or 20 years we perhaps would not have had the Columbus tragedy that occurred down in New Mexico a few days ago. There is no doubt in my mind but that these Mexicans that are on our side and came in under our present immigration laws furnished aid and comfort and information to the bandits who came over here and burned houses, killed women, and murdered sleeping soldiers.

Gentlemen talk about there being no time for this bill when we wisely spent several days on a bill for national defense against the Nation's enemies, and yet the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations thinks we are wasting time when we spend perhaps three days for the purpose of defending the labor people of this country against the encroachments of those brought here for the purpose of beating down the price of labor and setting up standards of living that no decent white man wants his family to be compelled to confront. [Applause.] That is the kind of defense provided for, Mr. Speaker, by this bill. That is the kind of defense that the two gentlemen from New York both want.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] talks about the people of Armenia being kept out. I read that scarecrow the other day in his speech. Why, we provide that those who are fleeing from religious persecution, whether that persecution be manifested by overt acts, positive laws, or regulations, shall not be subjected to an illiteracy test; and the gentleman, with that specious kind of argument that the gentleman is so much given to, undertakes to say that the steamship companies would not receive them, because they would be afraid they would be turned back on them when they got over here.

But, Mr. Speaker, watching carefully the career of those steamship companies for years, I undertake to say that no law scarcely ever deters them, because last year when only 400,000—the gentleman says only 3,000—came in, when only 400,000, even with war all over Europe, came in, 25,000 were sent back on account of the lawlessness of these steamship companies.

I submitted the point that the gentleman made to the law officer of the Bureau of Immigration, as to those who are brought over here by the steamship companies, whether, if they were not admissible, the steamship companies could possibly be fined for having brought them over here, and he said that such a construction would be perfectly absurd.

Mr. Speaker, we have a law against the admission of those who are liable to become a public charge. How can the steamship companies on the other side know whether those people are liable to become a public charge? They take the chances on that. They took the chances on those 25,000 that were turned back because they were liable to become a public charge. But certainly when we double the fine, when we double the price of transportation over, it will make the agents of these steamship companies a great deal more cautious in bringing over those who are not admissible, and at the same time they will not keep out those who are admissible.

Now, the part of the bill that has got teeth in it is the illiteracy test. That is what the gentlemen clamor and kick against, and that will keep out those who come here who were in the Youngstown strike a few weeks ago. Seventy per cent of them were illiterate aliens. It will keep out people like those who, in the Lawrence, Mass., strike a few years ago, were following in the wake of some literate aliens, some literate leaders; but behind them was a long line of Industrial Workers of the World, who flaunted on their flag the words, "No God, no law, no master." Those are the people whom it will keep out. A few years ago my friend from Kansas, Mr. CAMPBELL, and the other Kansas Members, received from the railroad companies in Kansas a protest against the passage of this bill, because the railroad companies said, if I recollect aright, that 99 per cent of the Mexicans were illiterate. Those are the fellows we are after, Mr. Speaker. Those are the ones whom the people want kept out, and whom this House is going to vote to keep out. [Applause.]

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 134, noes 49.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of this rule will, when their names are called, vote "yea" and those opposed will vote "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 284, nays 73, answered "present" 7, not voting 69, as follows:

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I voted no. I wish to withdraw my vote and answer "present," as I am paired with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors. The resolution is agreed to, and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, before the House goes into Committee of the Whole I want to state an agreement as to the division of time. The rule provides for three and a half hours on each side. Of that I have agreed to give the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] an hour and three-quarters to use as he sees fit to distribute it, and I to control an hour and three-quarters on this side.

Mr. SABATH. That is in favor of the bill.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. And, Mr. Speaker, I have agreed with the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL] that the three and a half hours on our side against the bill shall be divided equally; that he shall control 1 hour and 45 minutes and I control 1 hour and 45 minutes.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time be divided in that way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that this seven hours of general debate shall be divided as follows: That the gentleman from Alabama shall control 1 hour and 45 minutes, the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] 1 hour and 45 minutes, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL] 1 hour and 45 minutes, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] 1 hour and 45 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Under the rule the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. SAUNDERS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bill H. R. 10384, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10384) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I believe under the rule the first reading of the bill is dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. BURNETT. I yield, Mr. Chairman, 15 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

[Mr. RAKER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN].

Mr. SIEGEL. And I also yield him eight minutes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 28 minutes.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, if the provisions of this bill which have just been discussed by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] were the only provisions to be considered here, I am persuaded to believe that this House would adopt them almost unanimously. We who are opposed to the bill object to it chiefly because of the literacy test. I have heard many arguments emanate from the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] in support of his measure. I have heard him on the floor of this House even plead the cause of organized labor, but only when this bill was up for consideration. I have heard him here plead the cause of the patriotic societies of this country; he has told us many times this fight is their fight; but I have never heard until this hour that, because the literacy test is not in the immigration law to-day, the recent raid of the Mexican bandits over our line could not have been prevented. For the first time we have learned that Villa and his bandit highwaymen were able to come within the confines of our great country and "murder our sleeping soldiers" because we have no literacy test. [Laughter.] I wonder if the gentleman takes himself seriously. Oh, we will hear him before the day is over appealing to "My Old Kentucky Home" and "Down on the Suwanee River," and his heart will weep for organized labor once more; but I never heard his voice in debate when we were trying to pass an act to do something for the white-faced children of this country who work out their young lives in mine and mill and factory and cannery, a measure fathered by the distinguished Congressman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING]. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have on previous occasions, and in this same hall, inveighed against the literacy test in this bill, which, in my judgment, is un-American, un-Christian, and almost inhuman. I have said that a literacy test will bar from our land its most vital necessity—strong, vigorous, simple, God-fearing peasants, who come here to find homes and to make the wilderness blossom into fertility—but will your literacy test keep out a single criminal, whose record and antecedents we are ignorant of? You will find some illiterate criminals who have been guilty of crime of sudden passion, of violence; men who united ignorance with illiteracy; but it is everlastingly true that the crimes most injurious to society, most detrimental to business, commerce, finance, are never the work of illiterates.

The forger, the conspirator, the crooked promoter, the business defaulter, the blackmailer, the bank thief, the political grafter, and all that class of criminals, outside of and outnumbering the criminals of passion and violence, are literate. They read and write, for these vicious talents must be supplemented by literacy to make them profitable. Vicious talent sharpened and developed by letters is the most serious problem society has to deal with. Yet this absurd literacy test will admit the dangerous European criminal of the continental cities and bar out the honest and hard-working and badly needed peasant—farmer and laborer—whether he be English or Irish or French or German or Hebrew or Polish or Italian or Lithuanian.

But enough of the literacy test for the present.

Mr. Chairman, movement is the law of life; the running rivers refresh and fertilize the world; the constant flow and ebb of the tides keep the ocean from stagnation and the earth from death; and above and beyond the circling spheres in their ordered march around the center of our system—itself in flight through space round vaster systems—control, maintain, and direct the movement and motion of our sphere, which is Life.

The sun draws from the deep the rains it scatters over hill and dale to feed the rivers, supply the springs, and renew the seas; the earth moves the moon, which is the mother of the tides; and so all the forces of God and nature, from the green things growing in our yard even to the outermost rim of limitless space, unite to compel this universal movement, which is Life.

Man—the races and nations, the tribes, and the clans—is subject to this universal law; it has been so since the beginning of recorded time; and this human movement is immigration. The race has ever been on the move. Out of the cradle of the race in the mysterious heart of Asia, stream after stream of races and tribes have flowed, pushing their predecessors onward before them, following the march of the sun from east to west, urging the vanguard out of the mountains into the deserts and the plains of Asia and onward into Europe, battling and contending for life and empire, mingling the bloods of the human elements into the fabric of nationality. Movement, eternal movement, the ceaseless marching of the peoples, the constant waste and restoration that eliminated the weak and made the strong, that selected the brawn and developed the brain that gave us the splendid thing we call civilization, that plowed and cultivated the fields from whose soil have sprung religion and culture, law and letters, trade and commerce, and the freedom, peace, happiness, and order that are ours to-day.

Under the providence of God and the inspiration of a great soul America was discovered and given to the world, and the human waters, left over from the war and waste of the centuries and bidding fair to stagnate, stale, and putrify in a Europe dammed by a mighty ocean from its instinct to move on began to flow across the sea to fill and fructify America and build up the America of to-day.

That constant addition of new men and new blood to the Republic is as necessary for the health and refreshment, the expansion and continuance of civilization and all it means to-day as always. Mr. Chairman, the springs of the race have dried up in Asia, and in the lands deprived of its fresh and life-giving elements, decay, desolation, ignorance, barbarism, and retrogression reign in desert silence where once power and empire flourished.

Immigration, the advent of new men, new blood, new brain and brawn in our land, is not a question of philanthropy for America, not a merely sentimental tribute paid to humanity and hospital; it is a matter of life and death, for the nation that seeks to arrest or stifle the natural laws of life and movement must eventually pay the penalty of lawlessness in stagnation and arrested growth. [Applause.]

Only those who will not read the story of the race, only those who refuse to see and recognize the reasons for the growth and greatness of the American Republic will be blind to the blessings of immigration and its necessity in our national life. The wars of the French Revolution and the Napoleonic era which kept Europe plunged in turmoil and wasteful struggle for 30 years were coeval with arrested growth and progress in this Republic and mark the age the stream of new life from Europe to America was at its feeblest and our national existence was in most peril from internal dissensions and weaknesses.

With the downfall of Napoleon and the cessation of war a stream of immigration set in which has been growing in volume ever since. Its flow has been westward into the virgin lands that had waited all the ages for the coming of the man with the plow and the ax, and out of them was carved the splendid Commonwealths that extend from the Mississippi Valley to the Pacific Ocean and that hang like a chain of jewels about the breast of the Republic. Wherever that refreshing and invigorating stream of new life flowed, wherever the life-giving tides of immigration swept, agriculture has flourished, industry has sprung up, cities have grown, and colleges have been founded; peace and prosperity have followed in its wake; education has been fostered, schools erected, churches planted, railroads built, and civilization has blossomed as the rose.

This is no fanciful picture. Look around! See and believe the evidence of your senses! If you ask me why the splendid resources and fruitful fields of the Sunny South have never yielded the fullness of their riches to their inhabitants, and why in many ways they lag behind their northern sisterhood of States, I answer you bluntly because, discouraging and discrediting the newcomers, you have missed the new blood and brain and brawn you need most urgently to give a new stimulus, a new vigor, a fresh reinforcement to your human forces.

You have fought the laws of nature and you have paid the penalty; you have deceived yourselves with the follies of provincialism, with the vain conceits you termed race pride, and with empty claims of superiority to races that in the fields of human endeavor have been outclassed by none. Judge the newcomer by his fruits, by his contributions to our national life, and you will learn that the last immigrant to America is as good—to put it modestly—as the first. [Applause.]

We need new blood, Mr. Chairman, new labor, new brain and muscle to-day, to-morrow, and the day after. The waste places are filling up; new vistas for a great and expanding Republic are opening up; new deserts to conquer, new fields to till, new rivers to span, new mountains to pierce and climb, for not always will the march of the Nation and the demands of our growth and civilization tolerate the anarchy and evil battling at our doors and desolating the fields and destroying the harvests that a sane humanity needs. Oh, take the scales of prejudice and provincialism from your eyes! Wake to the age you live in! Life and labor are of the universe! Humanity and destiny are stronger than all the littlenesses of provinces and peoples! Immigration is the seed and succor of the greater life that awaits this Republic; when it ceases the onward march ceases. [Applause.]

Men there are who are too proud to fight, esteeming war and waste a folly; some of us are too wise to commit the folly of seeking to hold back the tide of humanity that has been in flux since the dawn of time. King Canute was urged by his courtiers to command the tides to go back that he might show his powers, and when he uttered the royal mandate the unheeding waters rolled over him and his. The little King Canutes of America should hesitate before attempting and repeating his ancient folly. The stream of immigration may be dammed, regulated, and canaled to where its power and invigoration may do the most good; but if we attempt to divert this life-giving stream away from our lands to others less fortunate, we and not the immigrants will in the end be injured.

Movement is the law of life. Immigration is power and wealth for the land which draws it; and only national perversity and legislative stupidity will deprive us of its blessings. [Loud applause.]

IMMIGRATION.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SABATH. Will the Chair inform me how much time the gentleman has occupied?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has yielded back eight minutes.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, you can not keep up a high standard of living if you do not draw good pay, and you can not draw good pay if you are going to let into this country every day thousands of men who will go to work for less wages than you are getting. Now, that is all there is to this problem. It is a question of supply and demand of labor. I was talking to a man down in my district the other day—a man who works in a cotton mill at one of those semiskilled jobs—and I got to discussing with him this question of the restriction of immigration. "Why," he said, "they say that is nothing but this old A. P. A. bigotry." I said, "I do not care what they call it; names do not affect facts; how much pay are you getting?" He said that he was getting $13.50 a week. I said, "How much do you think you ought to get?" He said he thought he ought to get $16 or $18 a week. Said I, "My friend, how do you expect to get $16 a week when every year in normal peace times we are admitting to this country hundreds of thousands of immigrants who will take your job and work at it for $10 a week, or even less?"

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. I have only five minutes. I would rather not.

Now, Mr. Chairman, my objection to this bill is that in ordinary times it will only cut down immigration by 300,000, or thereabouts. If I had my way, I should be glad to vote for a bill that would either suspend immigration altogether for the next 10 years or come mighty near it. [Applause.] There are 20,000,000 men mobilized in Europe. In the course of this year or next they are going to start to demobilize those 20,000,000 men. They are going to project 20,000,000 men on the ruined industries of Europe, and I have an idea that those demobilized men are going to try to come over here in vast numbers. If we wish to keep them out, you will need some laws a mighty sight more drastic than any educational test in order to do so.

Mr. SABATH. Is the gentleman acquainted with the statistics of the immigration after the different wars of Europe?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes; I looked it up last year. But the situation after the present European war will in no wise resemble the situation after the Franco-Prussian War, when the armies and populations involved were small. You might as well compare a full cistern with an empty one. But, nevertheless, if it is true that we are not going to have immigration after this war, what is the objection to passing the bill?

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] is recognized.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I can do better than reiterate what I said on the matter of immigration when the subject was up for discussion in the Sixty-third Congress.

In the discussion of a great public question such as is involved in this bill for the restriction and regulation of immigration to our country all personal or individual interests and prejudices should be laid aside, and we should enter upon the discussion with open minds, striving solely for the ultimate and lasting welfare of our country. I regret that in this discussion and in former discussions on similar measures some of the speeches delivered have bristled with statements plainly indicating the prejudice and bias of those engaging in debate. For myself, I feel that while an advocate of the pending legislation I am not constrained in my support of the same from any desire to unjustly curb or handicap the aspirations of the people of any other land in their efforts to better their condition in life.

I trust that not only I but all who believe in the wisdom of the proposed legislation have more exalted reasons to offer in support of our position. In passing I wish to say that it is true that our country has been peopled by those coming from foreign lands in order that they might enjoy greater opportunity for improving their condition. It is true that in the past they came by thousands from the sturdy middle classes of northern and western Europe—the Irish, Dutch, English, Scotch, Swiss, Germans, Russians, French, and Scandinavians—and here with turgid muscles and hopeful hearts they proceeded to make new homes for themselves. It is true they felled the forests and reclaimed the wilderness and quickly adjusted themselves to our form of government. Practically all these different nationalities were of Anglo-Saxon, Celtic, and Germanic origin, all races well qualified by nature to understand and submit to constitutional representative government, being able to readily comprehend the great basic principle underlying our form of government—majority rule and peaceable acquiescence by the minority.

At this point I wish to say that my position on this measure has been criticized, and it has been said to me, "Your father was an immigrant. How can you favor such legislation?" True, my father was a Highland Scotchman of the most pronounced type, and the memory of old Scotland's lochs and heather were ever dear to him; but he, like the millions from the countries I have mentioned who migrated to our country, became an American citizen and gloried in the institutions of his adopted country. In view of my origin, I might be charged by some with lack of charity for the unfortunate of other lands and that I am narrow minded. God forbid that any other motives than love of country and patriotic devotion to the welfare of our people should influence me in the performance of my duty as a representative of the people.

In the enactment of laws such as is proposed in this bill, bearing directly on the very life and destiny of our Government, we should not be controlled by the present or immediate future effect of such legislation. But we should have in mind the welfare of unborn generations and its effect upon the perpetuity of the Government. I contend by this legislation we aim to remedy some present evils, but the great controlling factor in it is to forestall future impending danger to the Republic. This danger may now seem to be remote, but is none the less certain. For my part, I am willing to concede that some of the provisions of this bill are aimed at the immigration from southern Europe and oriental countries. It is contended by those opposing the bill that the immigrants from southern Europe, while perhaps illiterate, are honest and industrious and make good citizens, and that we are unjustly and purposely discriminating against them. It is further stated that we need them to perform our common labor and should welcome them with open arms, assuring us that the shrine of liberty will never be desecrated by them. True, they admit that the standard of living of these people is lower than the American's; but what of that? They dig our ditches, grade our railroads, and perform the bulk of our common labor. We need them in our business, so let them come. They dwell on the magnanimity of such a course on our part, extending our hands to the poor and the oppressed of the earth. Have we not listened to the recounting of the long list of poets, philosophers, soldiers, and statesmen of southern Europe? Certainly; and we also read that the light of liberty flickered for a time in Greece and Rome, until extinguished by corruption and barbaric force centuries ago. I am willing to concede all these things to be true. But we are legislating for the future welfare of America, not Greece and Rome.

I intend to support this bill because the class of immigrants it is intended to prevent from coming here, by their ways and manner of living, tend to lower the standard of American labor, and by this statement I do not simply mean the lowering of the wage of labor, but also the social tone or standard of labor. I am inclined to think no one will dispute this. However, if such there be, permit me to ask him, if he had a son, would he considered him occupying as high a plane of labor when placed upon a public work with a gang of such laborers, with whom he could not converse and who inhabit crowded tenements or box cars, as if he were laboring alongside men who recognize the American standard of living? I am speaking of the son who labors, not a foreman or timekeeper. Of course no one would admit such to be the fact. What has been and is the present effect on the standard of labor? To any observer it is plain, so far as common labor is concerned upon public works in our country, the standard has fallen to a level where Americans refuse to engage in it, both on account of the wage and the association. All will agree that labor should be exalted, and no man should blush to admit he labors for a livelihood, and that callouses on the hands produced by honest toil should be considered badges of honor rather than disgrace. But under existing conditions the American youth feels humiliated and disgraced when classed as a common laborer. Why? To my mind it is, in a great measure, due to the lowering of the standard of labor.

While it may be possible for the present generation of American boys to escape common labor, the unborn generations of the future will be unable to do so, and we should have a thought for them.

This is our country. Our posterity must abide here. Shall we consider their welfare, or shall we, unmindful of them, rush recklessly on, blocking every avenue of opportunity, and all done in the name of the downtrodden of other lands? Let us raise the standard of labor now, or at least make an effort to prevent it going still lower. How much better it would be if those who employ a large number of laborers would aid in raising the standard, pay better wages, and get better results even from Americans. I am fully aware that many of those opposed to this legislation are governed by humanitarian instincts, but I fear there are those more selfish and whose sentiments are expressed in the following lines—the name of the author I do not know:

Breed us more men, ye daughters of toil;
Ye alien mothers in far-off lands;
Sire them strongly, clean brawn and bone,
For we sift from the chaff the wheat alone,
When they come to die at our hands.

Think on our greed in your travail throes;
Think of us when ye bare your breast;
Mine and smelter shall claim their toll,
Roads shall be broken and reach their goal,
Though ye smell their blood from the west.

We build us strong on your woman's woe
Pier of granite and iron span,
Glare of furnace and caisson's gloom,
Of him whom ye gave us—a man.

Seas shall not bar your sons from harm;
Steppe or forest or alpine slope,
Our arms are long to grasp what we need,
The New World springs from your trampled seed;
Ye drain the dregs of our draught of hope.

So much for the effect of immigration on the standard of American labor. What of the ultimate effect upon our Government of the unlimited immigration of southern European and oriental races? Is it problematical? We are assured there is no danger. I am apprehensive. Not that I consider these races more criminally inclined than others, but the nature and characteristics of these people and their past history causes me to doubt their proper assimilation without danger to our country. I do not make this assertion intending to cast any reflections upon them. I know the story of the many brave and brilliant men of southern Europe. But I can not but feel that the people of northern and western Europe have demonstrated to a much greater degree their capacity for self-government and the ability to control themselves at such times when a more hot-blooded race would have plunged into revolution. I am satisfied in my own mind that the admission of countless thousands of immigrants into our country from southern Europe and oriental countries is a danger—remote, perhaps, but no less certain—to the life of our Government. It is revolution within, not danger from without, that will be the ever-present menace to our country. [Applause.]

The congenial assimilation of races so different in temperament and traditions as those of southern Europe and oriental countries with the races of northern and western Europe is a practical impossibility, even in this land of freedom. The former, lacking in comprehension of the true spirit of our institutions, can not be elevated to the true standard of American citizenship by assimiliation, but the tendency would be to proportionately lower the present standard. The incentive which brings these people to our shores is different from the incentive which caused the migration of northern and western Europeans to our country.

With perhaps some exception the immigrants we seek to bar from our shores do not come here with the avowed purpose of making this their permanent abiding place, but for the time being to take advantage of the greater opportunities here afforded to earn and save some money and later on to return to their native land, there to spend their declining years in comparative comfort on the small fortune accumulated here. They do not come with any clear understanding of the meaning and purpose of our Government, nor do they join with patriotic impulse in the hopes and aspirations of our people; they simply come to labor for the gold given as a recompense, never realizing the true sentiment of American citizenship. Strangely different were the feelings of the men of northern and western Europe, who, perhaps, possessed as great a love for native land, gave it up when they landed on our shores, and not only entered into the labor necessary to carve out for themselves homes here but they enter into the spirit of our political institutions, and, as soon as possible, under our laws, swore allegiance to our flag, and with joyous hearts sang in unison with native-born Americans "My country, 'tis of thee," and so forth. More than this, when revolution threatened our country's existence these men rallied around the old flag, and no braver defenders did it have than the sons of Erin who followed the banner of Sheridan and Birney and brave Phil Kearney; and the Scots, under McPherson, McArthur, and others; and the Germans who fought with Sigel, who after a hard day's battle in defense of our flag could be heard around their camp fire singing the songs of the fatherland. Thus was our country made strong and mighty by these classes of immigrants. But it is no argument, because this is true, that we should have unrestricted immigration into our country.

Much of the criticism of this bill is directed against that provision which provides for a literacy test, alleging that this is an unreasonable and indefensible provision, that it will permit the educated criminal to come in but will bar out the honest, industrious illiterate. I do not contend that illiteracy necessarily makes one a bad citizen, but I do contend that in a country such as ours the safety of the Government depends upon the intelligence of the people. To my mind it is not an unreasonable requirement to ask of those coming from foreign lands seeking all the privileges and opportunities of American citizenship. Surely to ask a man to be able to read 30 words in his native language as a passport into this land of ours is a very insignificant limitation, and will not be seriously objected to by anyone who favors restriction at all.

In supporting this bill I feel we are performing a patriotic duty. To charge us with having no charity for the unfortunate of other countries is idle declamation. If our friends who are opposing this bill are sincere in their devotion to the poor and unfortunate of other lands, why bar the pauper immigrant? Why not let him come in, where he will have an opportunity to participate in the generous charity and hospitality of our friends, who undoubtedly are better able to contribute to his need than his own countrymen? The truth is that the position of the advocates of this legislation is reasonable, logical, and patriotic. We have our own poor needing our care and charity; we have our own laboring man, whose interest we should guard; we have our country's future welfare to consider.

Our own people, our laborers, artisans, and tradesmen, are entitled to our first consideration. Our institutions should be protected from destruction by improper immigration. Certainly this is our plain duty, and I would say, in the language of that great American, Abraham Lincoln, "with malice toward none and charity for all," I stand first for America, her citizens, her homes, her hopes and aspirations, with a profound desire to see her flag, the emblem of the free, continue to float with ever increasing glory through the coming years. [Applause.]

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have in manuscript largely what I desire to say, and this is the third time in my life that I have ever had a manuscript. I do not intend to read it entire. I will, however, place it substantially in the RECORD if I have leave to extend my remarks, which I now ask.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. And before I either read or talk further, before I forget it—and I will refer to the gentleman later, before I sit down, if I do not forget it—let me say a word to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] with reference to his position touching this bill. It is wonderful how some people, who, upon all other subjects, from my standpoint, are, as they ought to be, wise in the main, can stumble touching some vital questions, especially touching immigration. The gentleman from Massachusetts has been opposed to immigration as far back, I know, as 1907, when the law substantially now on the statute books was enacted, and when the literacy test reported from the committee was in the bill, but not as finally enacted in the bill, and since that time he has been consistent.

Oh, he is a good protectionist. He tears passion into tatters when it comes to protection, and yet he starts out with the story of a man who was getting $10 a week or $12 a week who would like to have $16 a week. "How can you expect to get $16 a week when people can come over here and compete with you and work for $10 a week?" And yet he is not consistent when 300,000,000 people now in contest upon the other side—substantially all of them will be there, and their children, for a long, long time—manufacture and ship their products to the United States and come in competition with that man he talked to who was getting $12 a week, they working at half the wage he is receiving. And, O, my southern friends, you are agonizing about this competition from immigrants who you seek to keep out, and yet you stand for free trade and let in the products of those 300,000,000 people abroad, and then you turn around, not consistent, and make the same argument that the gentleman from Massachusetts makes.

So much for that. I have lived almost 80 years. [Prolonged applause.] I date back fairly well in my recollection to 1846. I was then a lad of 10 years of age, living on the Wabash. My parents were pioneers from North Carolina to the Wabash. They were Quakers and small landholders in North Carolina—my father, a Quaker by adoption, and my mother, from George Fox down, by inheritance. They left North Carolina, bearing testimony against slavery, as hundreds and multiplied thousands, I might say, like them did—they and Moravians and other small landholders. What for? To get away from servile labor that was performing similar labor which they performed into a country where servile labor did not exist. [Applause.]

And yet I am not here to dwell greatly on ancient history except as it illustrates present conditions and is germane to this bill. Now, so far what I have said is not in the manuscript. We all belong to the human race. I am glad to belong to it. We are divided into great racial divisions. The Caucasian race takes in all those people, 300,000,000 strong, who are waging that desperate war, such as the world never saw before, on the other side. I am not afraid of the Caucasian race, whether it be French, German, Irish, Scotch, English, or Slav; and as to the Italian, I am not afraid of it, whether it is literate or illiterate, so long as it substantially by labor lives in the sweat of its face, supports its family, makes a small saving, and cares for and educates its children; and in this country it must educate its children, because in our common schools 20,000,000 of those children are compelled to go to school, whether their parents assent or not, and become literate, whereas their parents, many of them, were illiterate.

Mr. KONOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. KONOP. Is it not a fact that the children of the immigrants educate their children far better than the native Americans do?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I do not think that is a fact, stated so broadly. Yet it is true, from my own observation in Indiana and in Illinois and from what I read generally, that the children of the immigrants, the second generation of them—the first generation came to this country—it is true that they are quite equal in the common schools and the high schools with "our people," as we call them, whose parents came here three or four or five generations ago; quite as competent, and quite as wise, and quite as anxious for education, and quite the equal of the ancient "first families" that came to this country, some of them 300 years ago, but not a great many, and many of them 100 years ago, and many 50 years ago.

Now, the human family is a peculiar one. Man naturally is a religious animal. I believe the gentleman from Massachusetts is a direct descendant of some one of the people who came over in the Mayflower. A great people they were. Why? Because there was no place on the Continent of Europe or in Great Britain where a man could have freedom of religion and conscience without persecution. [Applause.] Well, they came over and had a pretty hard time. They were the common people, the Puritans; but no sooner did they get over here than they wanted to have a close corporation [laughter], and they did not want anybody but Puritans; others were not encouraged.

FIRST GUARANTY OF RELIGIOUS FREEDOM.

It ran along that way for several generations; but early there began to be protests against immigration that was not Puritan. There was old Roger Williams, that old Baptist, you know, who did not agree with the Puritans. In civil affairs he wanted everybody to obey the law, but in religious affairs he wanted every individual in Massachusetts Bay and everywhere to have freedom touching his religious views, without persecution. Well, they banished old Roger. He went down to Providence and Rhode Island Plantations. I said that on my mother's side from George Fox they were Quakers. Well, there was one branch of them, the Folgers, the Coffins, the Macys, and others, who were residents in Massachusetts. They went to Nantucket, because they had to choose between going there and being hanged if they stayed in Massachusetts. [Laughter.] So there you are.

Roger Williams, the Baptist, went down to Providence and Rhode Island Plantations, and he secured a charter from King Charles the Second, who, if I recollect aright in my reading of history, succeeded the Protectorate. That charter guaranteed to him and all people in that colony under that grant religious liberty. The historian says—I have not verified it, but I have no doubt it is true—that in all the history of the world from the beginning of time there never before had been written into law any enactment which guaranteed religious freedom.

A little before that a liberal charter was granted to Calvert, Lord Baltimore, the Catholic. Under the leadership of Calvert they organized a government in Maryland, and the Toleration Act was passed, which gave religious freedom, and the historian records the fact that the few Puritans who were in Virginia, where the Church of England was the leading church, the State church, went to Maryland because of persecution in Virginia. Oh, there is much of instruction if you will run back a little bit in the history of the settlement of this country. Our forebears, worthy as they were, made their mistakes. The historian tells us that Maryland was called the Sanctuary. Well, in the fullness of time, there being much disagreement about immigration and much of persecution in most of the colonies—in the fullness of time came the Revolution; and then it was that the Irishman, the Scotchman, the German, the Hollander, and the descendants of the Pilgrims came together as one man, with La Fayette, Von Steuben, Kosciusko, and Pulaski aiding Washington and his generals in military strategy, and shoulder to shoulder they won out and obtained their liberty. [Applause.]

And, lo and behold, after the Confederation, when they came to frame the Constitution in 1789, in a convention presided over by Washington, they wrote into that Constitution, where it stands to-day and has stood from that time to this, the guaranty of religious liberty and a divorce between church and state, and so it has remained until this day. [Applause.]

A step further. Immigration was invited. It came. A great many immigrants came from abroad. There were complaints once in a while. About 1816 there were people agreeing with my friend the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], and agreeing with many gentlemen from the South and the West. I am not abusing them, but it was thought that there were almost too many coming, and that they were poor—many paupers, and so forth—the same complaint that you have now, although it is only a complaint now, because but few paupers or undesirable people are coming now from abroad, since 1907, when the present law was enacted. There was a good deal of flurry just 100 years ago. But about the same time when western New York was a rich and unpopulated land, and Ohio invited immigrants, whole villages, townships, and cities were substantially depopulated by that stream of emigration of our kind of people who went West. Common labor could not be had. Skilled labor was not very plentiful, and then again immigration was courted and invited, and it came in great streams. Why was that? It was because there was nobody to do the common labor that was absolutely necessary to be done.

THE AMERICAN ASSOCIATION.

It went on until about 1836 or 1837, and they kept coming and coming, sent over by Governments and by organizations. Agents were sent over, because we needed the labor. That was some time prior to 1836. They came and helped build the railroads and dig the canals and do the common labor. But here in 1836 or 1837 the native-American movement was organized, and a demand was made which was promoted throughout the length and breadth of the country against that immigration. The organization demanded that the naturalization laws be repealed and that the ports of the country be closed against all immigration. My friend the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] wants to close the ports for 10 years, but then it was demanded that they be closed entirely.

Those agitators of 1837 had more excuse for their opposition than have those of to-day. There had been years of assisted immigration.

In England the parish officers sold houses belonging to the parishes to secure the funds to aid emigration to America. In 1828 the health officer of Baltimore, in his annual report, declared that many people had come from foreign ports who were absolutely destitute. A year later he mentioned "some lame, blind, and others in a state of idiocy," and told of the arrival of immigrants whose passage had been paid by the parishes in England. Again, in 1830, he described the condition as deplorable, with "the halt, the lame, and the blind" among the immigrants. The American consul at Jamaica was visited in 1831 by the captains of American ships who complained of a law which compelled them to carry away one pauper for each hundred tons of cargo or pay a fine of £100 currency.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

So the native Americans again sought to check immigration and naturalization, but the internal improvements which we had inaugurated called for labor beyond the home supply; we had begun to build canals and railroads. The contractors on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad and the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal could not secure in this country the unskilled labor necessary to carry on those great works; so they turned to Europe. They sent agents to Great Britain and Ireland and imported workmen. They contracted to pay those men $12 a month and board, and the men contracted to work out their passage.

The historian of the times admits that the open door was abused; that England, Ireland, Scotland, and other countries emptied their poorhouses and jails and shipped their paupers and convicts to America. New York put up the bars against convicts and was urged to deny admission to paupers. In that day Congress and the country looked to the States, and insisted that New York, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Maryland close their ports to convicts and paupers to protect the country.

The agitation begun in 1837 against immigration ran along until the forties, when great floods destroyed the crops in Germany, when multiplied thousands were stricken with poverty, were without subsistence, and there was a terrible condition, and again emigration was promoted by Germany. Just a little later came the potato rot in Ireland, where a whole people were starving. Then, a little later—and I will bunch the three together—came the revolution of 1848, when, as I understand it, Mr. RODENBERG, that revolution having failed, your father came with Schurtz and Sigel and many others to this country, 300,000 strong. [Applause.] Well, they were welcome. We were very sorry for the Irish and the Germans—especially for the Irish—because they were in abject want. You know charity made great contributions, and the United States furnished the ships to carry the cargoes of food across the oceans to them. Congress was appealed to, but Congress did not respond, and the reason it did not respond, assigned then, and honestly assigned, was a condition somewhat similar to that which we have now. The Treasury was empty and they did not have the wherewithal to appropriate the half million dollars that had been asked for. [Laughter.]

Those who came here found work, wages, and food, and prospered. They wrote back to friends of the opulence of America, where the people had three and four meals a day, with meat for everybody; they said that bullocks' and sheep's heads were thrown away and there were no empty bellies in this land of plenty. So the stream of aliens continued to come year after year from Ireland and Germany. The Irish generally settled in the cities of the East, while many of the Germans came in colonies and pushed on to the West. Chicago has one-third of its population made up of aliens. New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and other cities in the East and St. Louis in the West had larger foreign population in percentage than they have to-day. These new immigrants lived in colonies, spoke their own languages, had their own social customs and amusements, read their own newspapers and books, and had their own military companies, uniformed as in the land of their birth, so that it was said that an assembly of these military companies on training days resembled a mimic review of the armies of the world.

It ran along, and now we come to a time that I recollect. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 22½ minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I am like the gentleman from California, I have hardly begun; but I must hasten along, because there are some interesting things that I want to say. I have the permission of the House to print, so I will jump along.

THE KNOW-NOTHING MOVEMENT.

The native American opposition broke out anew and became a powerful political organization threatening the supremacy of the old parties. Its popular name, the Know-Nothing Party, was due to its secrecy and the professed ignorance of its plans by those identified with it, for no member would admit that he knew anything about it. It worked in secret, all movements directed from a central agency. It proscribed not only aliens but all native Americans who refused to cooperate with it.

I recollect it. I was a tolerably husky lad at that time, 20 years old, and since then I have frequently thanked God that I was not old enough to join it. Probably if I had been old enough I would have joined it, because it abounded greatly on the Wabash. [Laughter.] Its blows were delivered in the dark. It proposed that none but native born should be eligible for public office. Its hostility to the alien ramified, until it proscribed religious as well as political organizations, developed antipathies toward churches as well as toward foreign born, encouraged riot and religious persecution, which resulted in the burning of churches and convents, and it created divisions in other churches until it almost appeared that the Christian religion had become a Babel of warring sects instead of a great, harmonious army following the Master. What would have been the outcome of the antagonisms encouraged by this new development of native Americanism, much of it less than two generations here, no one knows had it not been absorbed or sidetracked by the great antislavery movement which led to the Civil War.

UNION OF ALIENS FOR NATIONAL DEFENSE.

That great American tragedy developed the fact that there was no alien sentiment in our population. The Irish, the German, the Italian, the Scandinavian, and the Greek societies in the North became military units in the Union Army, and they contributed no small part in the preservation of the Union. The men who followed Sheridan and those who fought with Siegel made history in that war, and it is said that Jefferson Davis attributed to the aliens of the North the defeat of the Confederate armies and the preservation of the Union. [Applause.]

We have had no such violent outbreaks against the alien immigrant since the Civil War as those that recurred from time to time in the generation preceding that war. We have continued to find work for all our own people and for millions from abroad. We have increased our population from 31,000,000 in 1860 to 100,000,000 in 1910, and our national wealth from $16,000,000,000 to $187,000,000,000. We have created new empires in the West, made conquest of mountain and desert, and have developed a homogeneous union out of the most discordant contributions of the world to testify to the vitality of the principles on which this Government was founded.

ALIEN CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROSPERITY.

The alien immigrant has contributed to this result, and I have been unable to see any more danger from the alien of recent years than from those who came in the early days of the Republic. The Italian, the Hungarian, the Pole, the Lithuanian, and the Russian Jew are just as anxious to work as were the Irish and the German 100 years ago, and they are developing into Americans more rapidly, because we have found better means to educate the immigrant and make him understand what this Government means. Should this Nation be forced to defend itself against any other power on earth I have not the slightest doubt that the alien part of our population would, without exception, bear its share in the defense of the Government as it did from 1861 to 1865. A literacy test in the past would have shut out millions of people who helped to develop this continent and build this Nation, and I believe the future may be judged by the past. [Applause.]

Who are the aliens in America? They are so large a part of the Nation that we would not be a Nation of 100,000,000 without them. A recent census report estimated that in 1900 the population resulting from immigration since 1790 amounted to more than one-third of the whole, or from 25,000,000 to 30,000,000 out of 76,000,000 as the total population, and that they had produced $40,000,000,000 of the total wealth, which then was less than $100,000,000,000.

IMMIGRATION GOVERNED BY DEMAND FOR LABOR.

The tide of immigration has risen and receded in response to the demands for labor in this country, particularly for unskilled labor. The Commissioner of Immigration expresses the opinion in his report that a great part of those who give their occupations as farmers and mechanics come to accept unskilled labor, not from choice, but because there is a constant demand for unskilled labor in this country that can not be supplied at home. It is work, not the wage, that now, as in the past, throws a great part of this unskilled labor to the immigrant. He begins at the bottom, where he does not compete with native labor, and he does not come into competition with our own labor until he has risen in the scale by industry and intelligence to produce skilled labor.

Whenever this tide of immigration has risen to numbers that have alarmed native labor, or there has been a depression in business, the tide has receded. In 1872 we had a very large immigration, but in 1874, after the panic, immigration dropped to less than one-half of what it had been. In 1892 there were 623,000 immigrants, and in 1895 only 280,000. Mr. Gompers, in his report to the American Federation of Labor in 1894, said that there were 3,000,000 unemployed in this country.

In 1905, 1906, and 1907 there were more than 1,000,000 immigrants each year, but in 1908, after the business depression, the number of immigrants fell to 782,000.

Mr. Morrison, secretary of the American Federation of Labor, is reported in the hearings of this committee as estimating that there were between 4,000,000 and 5,000,000 unemployed last year. The net immigration of 1915 was 43,000. In the last six months of 1915 the net gain by immigration was 2,392, and in December there were 570 more departures than arrivals. The Commissioner of Immigration says: "These figures show quite clearly that the decline in immigration had begun prior to the outbreak of the European war and was probably a reflection of industrial conditions in the United States."

WHENCE COMES DEMAND FOR RESTRICTION.

This demand for the restriction of immigration comes largely from sections of the country which receive little immigration; the Southern States receive only 2 per cent.

Mr. HARDY. If the gentleman will allow me, is Texas included in the Southern States that he mentions?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of West Virginia. Is West Virginia included in the statistics?

Mr. CANNON. I think not; still I will not answer certainly. These statistics were gathered for me. I have respect for the leaders of the great labor organizations, but I sometimes think they become unduly alarmed over this question and fail to understand the real sentiments of the people whom they represent. We have here petitions from the United Miners' Union, and yet the majority of the miners are immigrants who are aiding to bring their friends here and secure work for them. It is the same in many other branches of labor, and I have been unable to find the same hostility to the immigrant in the ranks of labor that is represented by the leaders of the labor organizations. There has always been a kindred feeling in the ranks of labor, which extends the hand of fellowship to newcomers.

PRESENT INCREASE IN POPULATION.

What reason is there for greater restriction now when we have practically no immigration? The increase in population of the United States in the census decade was the lowest recorded since the Government was organized. From 1790 to 1800 the increase was 35.1 per cent; in the next decade, 36.4 per cent; the next three decades, 33 per cent; from 1840 to 1860, 35.5 per cent; from 1860 to 1870, 22.6 per cent; from 1870 to 1880, 30 per cent; from 1880 to 1890, 25.5 per cent; from 1890 to 1900, 21.2 per cent; and from 1900 to 1910, 21 per cent. The downward tendency will probably be greater in the present census decade than in the last decade.

President Lincoln, in his message of 1862, estimated that the population of the United States in 1910 would be 138,918,526, or 40,000,000 greater than it was recorded by the last census. He saw in an increase of population a boon for the country, but some of our people to-day are less optimistic and see only danger in the growth of population. I can not agree with them, for the development of the great resources of this country depend upon its population.

The forests, the iron ore, the coal, and the prairies have been here for untold ages, but America only became the richest Nation on earth when there were people here to develop and utilize these natural riches; and, let me tell you, brawn has played quite as great a part in this development as brain. While I want to see all our people educated, I have often found as much brain action in those who could neither read nor write as in the products of some of our colleges. The State prisons of New York have as many college and academy graduates as they have of the illiterate [laughter], and the head teacher at Sing Sing reports that many of those who possess ability to read are unable to understand the meaning of what they read. I prefer understanding to such a literacy test. [Applause.]

We have corrected the mistakes of the past, and no longer may the mentally, morally, or physically deficient enter our ports; nor may they come under contract, nor in the old, crowded condition of immigrant ships. We have now well-considered laws to guard this country from the immigrant when he becomes a charge on our own people; we admit only those who may contribute by labor to the upbuilding of the country, its industries, and its wealth. The literacy test has not in the past, as applied to our own people, produced better and more efficient workers, especially in the shops and mines and on the farms. I do not believe it will improve the quality of our immigration.

Some gentlemen here fear that the close of the European wars will increase the tide of immigration, but I do not so believe. Europe will have need for all her able-bodied men to make up for the ravages of war. Our laws now prevent the coming of those who would become a charge upon this country.

WHO ARE THE NATIVE AMERICANS?

But who are the native Americans? I have for years tried to find the native element in our population. I recently turned to a report of the Census Office, under the title of "A Century of Population Growth," in which is given a list of the family names which appeared in the First Census in 1790. This does not give all of the names of the more than thirty hundred thousand people living then in the United States, but it does pretend to give all the family names that represented 100 or more people, on the assumption that the "heads of families in 1790 were the founders of the Republic," and that these names, numbering 27,337, would be "the basis for our American genealogy." There were then thirty-one hundred and seventy-two thousand four hundred and forty-four white people in the United States, and less than 30,000 family names. These were the native whites in this country when the Constitution was adopted and Washington became the first President.

How many of us can trace our lineage back to those first American families, and how many of us are compelled to trace our lineage back to the alien immigrant? I tried to trace the membership of this House back to that American "Almanac de Gotha," and I could not locate one-third of you. [Laughter and applause.] There are 135 Members of this House whose family names can not be found in the First Census of the United States. These 135 Representatives represent the alien immigrants to this country, but who will deny that they have American names? I found the name of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], who is one of the later pioneers of this movement, written in 15 different ways, and that may justify his position. [Laughter and applause.] I found the name of the chairman of the Committee on Immigration and the author of this bill, but few of the other members of the committee can trace their lineage back to the first families. I was able to find my own name there spelled in six different ways, from Cannon to Canine, but I have other historical records that some of my ancestors were driven out of New England long before this First Census on pain of having their ears cut off if they remained; so I have no particular pride in finding my name among the first families of the Republic. I am willing to be put down with the aliens of this House. [Laughter.]

The Senate is not better represented in that old list than the House. While my friend [Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts] is, as I said, represented by 15 different spellings, I have been unable to find the name of his distinguished father-in-law, the senior Senator from Massachusetts, who is one of the most brilliant and cultured men in public life. That ought to be a consolation to some of you. If Senator LODGE is an alien, who among us may not be proud of the title? [Applause.]

The Congress of the United States is not the only place where scions of the first families do not monopolize the membership. There were no McKennas, no McReynolds, no Pitneys, no Van Deventers, and no Brandeis for the membership of the Supreme Court; no McAdoos, no Burlesons, and no Houstons to sit around the Cabinet table. Business, commerce, manufacture, science, literature, art, and labor, as now represented in our great American family, would have lost in nomenclature if not in development had the first Congress of the United States enacted such legislation as this and closed the ports to the alien immigrant. I can find in that list of first families in 1790 no Agassiz, Edison, or Westinghouse; no Carnegie, Harriman, Havemeyer, or Mackey; no Astor, Belmont, Lorillard, or Leiter; no Funston or Pershing; no Watterson or Pulitzer; no St. Gaudens or La Farge; no Gompers or Morrison; no Billy Sunday or Mary Pickford.

Mr. SIEGEL. And there was no Hughes.

Mr. CANNON. I did not look far enough to find out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SIEGEL. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois 15 minutes more.

Mr. CANNON. These are a few of the names which would never have appeared in American history had Congress in 1790 seen fit to legislate against the alien immigrant. But there is one other name absent from this old list of first families with which we have all become familiar in recent years, for it has appeared in the public prints more, perhaps, than any other associated with stirring events in both military and civil life; at the head of a regiment of rough riders, as governor of New York, as Vice President and President of the United States; as lion hunter, explorer, naturalist, discoverer of the River of Doubt, as idol of many people who call themselves the true Americans of this composite people; the name of Roosevelt does not appear in any form, synonym, or root in the list of first families. [Laughter and applause.]

Who, then, are the native Americans who have for 100 years periodically grown hysterical about putting up the bars to protect themselves against alien blood, and then opening wide the gates to welcome immigration to an enlarged field of labor in this melting pot of the world, which has for 300 years been pouring from its crucible a new composite American to stand as a type both like and unlike those of the older civilizations from which the virile blood of America has been drawn? [Applause.]

SERVILE LABOR.

Before I sit down I want to ask why is it—and I call the attention of the gentlemen from the South to that—why is it that the gentleman from Alabama reports this bill? Why is it when only 2 per cent of the immigration that comes from abroad goes south of Mason and Dixon's line? I think I can explain it without abusing anybody. I do not abuse anybody. I was born in North Carolina, and I have a warm feeling for that State and for its climate, and my mother's eyes would fill with tears whenever she talked about it. You had servile labor and you had a white aristocracy. Labor was not considered honorable by the men south of Mason and Dixon's line. There would have been no struggle if it had not been for the fact that on the southern bank of the Ohio labor was servile and not considered honorable, while on the north side the labor was performed by American citizens.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I will yield to the gentleman, if he will be quick.

Mr. QUIN. I think the gentleman is mistaken about servile labor in the South; a man who worked was considered just as good as anybody else.

Mr. CANNON. And yet you take the mountainous spots, and it was a common saying that the negro slave was cared for in his old age, and although he did not vote he looked down upon the poor white with disdain. Take Dixon's book, Leopard's Spots. It is an overdrawn picture of the conditions before the Civil War. I was acquainted somewhat with the immigrants that came from the Southland to Illinois and Indiana. It was not very lovely for the white man down there that did not own slaves. But that is all behind us. It is wonderful how well you have done, but think of it. The hum of the spindles is being heard, the mines are being opened, your lumber is being marketed, and with it all there has been prosperity.

Good heavens! If you could get 20 per cent or could have received 20 per cent of the immigration that the Northland has been getting since the close of the Civil War, if it could have gone down there, you would have been 50 years ahead in your material development, and I believe 50 years ahead in every kind of development of where you are now. [Applause.] It will come in time, and Godspeed the time!

QUALIFICATIONS FOR VOTING.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have some very interesting figures here which I desire to call to the attention of the committee. I get these figures from the World Almanac—and you can not dispute what the World Almanac says, you are estopped. [Laughter.] I presume it is correct. I gathered these statistics from that publication last night. In the State of Alabama an alien who has declared his intention, or taken out his first papers, as it is called, and who has lived in the State for two years, is made a voter.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is mistaken, and if the World Almanac says that it is mistaken. He has to be a naturalized citizen in order to vote.

Mr. CANNON. How long has that been the case?

Mr. BURNETT. Ever since the new constitution of 1901, and possibly further back.

Mr. CANNON. Thank God, there is progress there. [Laughter.] I am merely taking these from the World Almanac, and I am glad that the gentleman has interrupted me.

Mr. BURNETT. Oh, I knew that the gentleman did not intend to misrepresent anyone, and I desire to call his attention to the fact that Indiana is one of the States that he has in mind.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; I am coming to that in a moment. Take Arkansas: First papers and one year's residence is all that is necessary to entitle a man to vote. Is that correct? Now we come to Indiana—Indiana, a State in which I grew up, of which I am proud, and I live within 6 miles of the western border now; Indiana, with her great Democratic representation in this House, solid two years ago; Indiana, composed of our kind of people and so represented—and what do we find the case to be there? An alien on declaring his intention to become a naturalized citizen, if he lives in the State for six months, is entitled to vote. Oh, judging from the votes of some of our Indiana friends. Great heavens! [Laughter.] Why do you not take the beam out of your own eye and do what you can to cure alleged abuses, rather than to come in here and vote for and advocate this literacy test? Now comes Kansas: A declaration of intention and a residence of six months let these illiterate people vote there. Missouri—show me! A declaration of intention and a residence of one year permits this illiterate alien to vote there. Now we come to Michigan: A declaration of intention and a residence of two years is all that is necessary.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. That has not been the law in Michigan for nearly 20 years.

Mr. CANNON. I am very glad to hear that.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I am sorry to find the gentleman from Illinois so far behind.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I am not behind. It is this table and information in this World Almanac that is behind.

The World Almanac has this note at the head of this table of statistics:

Communicated to the World Almanac and corrected to date by the attorneys general of the respective States.

And now comes Nebraska: Halt! First papers and six months' residence entitles a man to vote. Is that right? Think of it! The home of William Jennings Bryan! [Laughter.] Texas: A great State. Some one said that it is larger than Germany. One year's residence and first paper, so the World Almanac says, entitles the illiterate alien to vote.

ALIEN LABOR FOR SOUTH AND NEW ENGLAND.

Mr. Chairman, before I forget it I desire to call attention to a particularly vital matter in this bill, and I desire to read it now. I will ask Members to turn to page 3. Speaking of the poll tax, it is provided:

That the said tax shall not be levied on account of aliens who enter the United States from the Dominion of Canada, Newfoundland, the Republic of Cuba, or the Republic of Mexico for a temporary stay—

Does that let in the factory labor for a temporary stay in the State of Massachusetts, I will ask the distinguished gentleman from that State [Mr. GARDNER]? I want to ask the gentlemen from Texas, does that let in Mexican laborers from the Republic of Mexico when you desire laborers to pick your cotton and harvest your crops? I am reliably informed Mexicans cross the border there periodically for agricultural labor. I guess it does; I guess it does.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman desires me to answer that question I will do so, but I do not want to take up the gentleman's time.

Mr. CANNON. Very well. I will be very glad if it can be answered, because the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], in his remarks upon the adoption of this rule, said that the present Mexican war, in his opinion—I think I quote him correctly; or threat of war, at least—the condition down there on the border, which caused the death of citizens in Texas and of our soldiers, was due to the fact that there was no literacy test.

Mr. GALLIVAN. That is what he said.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I want to tell a little story if I can in my time. I knew Judge Holman of Indiana very well. I served with him for many years. He was one of the most distinguished men who ever served in Congress from that State; a perfect gentleman, an able legislator, but he had the reputation of being the "watchdog" of the Treasury. Years before he died once in a while I would meet him, and we would take a drink together. Now, I can take a drink, and it will not affect me much, but if he ever took one or two he became exceedingly bright, and he would reminisce. [Laughter.] One day he met an old friend of his from Vermont who had served with him in former years, who was second auditor under Grant; I forget his name. He shook hands with us, but he did not drink; he would not drink at all. Holman said to this gentleman, "Oh, I recollect our service with very great pleasure. We were both called watchdogs of the Treasury. So we were, so we were, but we always had sense enough not to growl when our friends were around." [Prolonged laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, just one minute more.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. I have enough here to talk three hours, but I want to apply that story. There is to be no head tax of $8 for people who come in from Canada or Mexico and these other places—temporarily! [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I am proud of this country; I am glad to have been born in this, or perhaps I had better say in the last, generation. I would like to live to see the swing of the twentieth century and what it will bring. Nature is kindly; I can quit whenever the man with the scythe comes, but I desire to say that I have this faith, that we will grow stronger and stronger, and that we will continue to become so and to live under the Constitution of the United States which guarantees property, liberty, freedom in religious opinion, with legislation that shall cover the rich and poor, the great and small, the high and low, everyone within our borders, native born or naturalized, like the grace of God, and that under it we will make our laws strong enough to restrain the strongest and to protect the weakest, and that for more centuries than I can say the great Republic will grow and grow and continue to retain as it ought to our privileges and our civilization. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. KENT].

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California three minutes.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, the eloquence of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has not swerved me from laying before this House some fundamental conceptions of democracy.

Democracy is the last development of government and of human experience, only possible among peoples that have had long training in independence and self-control; only to be exercised by those who have learned how to make their own laws and to obey and respect those laws when made. Democracy can not be conferred upon the unripe or the unfit; it is and must be inherent.

Bitter has been this Nation's experience in our Southern States, when by injudicious action we conferred upon an immature race responsibilities for which it was unequal; and even after that experience gentlemen talk as though all people that come to our shores should be cheerfully admitted and should participate not only in governing themselves but in governing the rest of us, who are born of ancestry capable of self-government. For my part, I believe in a real democracy not stratified by differences of fortune.

We who are capable of self-government should not feel that we ought to import people to do the hard work that we ought to do for ourselves, for under such conditions democracy is impossible. Our people should be driven into productive labor, our sort of folks should consider no work as dirty work to be laid upon the backs of the despised and the downtrodden, for under such conditions democracy is impossible.

Importations of labor to be heedlessly exploited brought the need for contract-labor legislation to prevent Carnegie from further debauching the citizenship of Pennsylvania.

Importations of the unfit mean no less than the privilege to exploit them by those who possess the capital and the land of this country.

Unless a man can go from below to the top, as his merit shows, in our society, there is a denial of democracy.

It sounds well to talk of offering a refuge to the oppressed of all the world, but we must also ask ourselves whether these oppressed are all of them capable of ruling not only themselves but of ruling us and our children, for this is democracy.

I favor this bill and the literacy test. If I could stop all immigration until we could master our insistent problem, I would do so. The literacy test will in the average check the undesirables. I would rather have it a test of blood and race, and confine our immigration to northern Europe; but failing that, the literacy test.

The illiterate are those most subject to oppression, and oppression is worse for the oppressors than the oppressed. This is proven by history.

We can not afford to hold open our labor market to those who break down American standards of living. Protection of American goods and free trade in labor are the absurd conditions which can only exist in a prodigal waste of natural resources. In the name of democracy and in the hope of free government we must sort the population, which is the Nation; otherwise our pretense of democracy is but a farce and a fallacy. [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HOOD].

Mr. HOOD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I beg your indulgence for a few moments while I, as a member of the Immigration Committee, submit a few reasons why I think this measure should pass.

I take it that there is no opposition to the admirable administrative provisions contained in the bill and none to the sections excluding those that are morally, mentally, and physically unfit. The controversy therefore hinges upon the literacy test.

I believe that we, as representatives of the people, should be eternally on guard and be ready and willing to remedy any cause that in our judgment might endanger or menace the American Republic; anything that would have a tendency to sap its vitality, its strength, its power, its glory, or to correct any conditions that may arise to disturb and injure our moral, economic, social, and political status. It is true that this bill does not in any way affect the millions of foreigners now in our midst, nor does it interfere with the great opportunities this land of freedom and liberty affords them. Many of them have contributed largely to our success as a people and nation. Time will enable them, if it has not already done so, to assimilate our ideas, our customs, our habits, and thereby to have the proper conceptions of our Government and all its glorious institutions. My thoughts are directed largely to the future and to the effect of the continued influx of aliens to this country, especially the undesirable.

The commissioner general, in his 1914 report, says:

> Immigration, judged from the results of the year, has apparently reached the million mark permanently.

In fact, during the year 1914, 1,218,480 of them landed here; the year prior, 1913, there came over 1,197,892. Doubtless as many would have arrived last year had it not been for the European war.

I believe when this war terminates, if it ever does, that the desirable immigrants will remain at home, while those that are undesirable, encouraged by steamship companies, will emigrate to America.

Hon. Bourke Cockran, in his splendid speech before the committee against this bill, said:

> It is true [speaking of the immigrant] that he crowds sometimes into a great city like New York, and it is also true that in more than one quarter of a great city you can find a population almost entirely foreign; signs over shops are in foreign characters, the language actually spoken is foreign, the habiliments of the people foreign, of the women especially, among whom that tendency to color so strong in certain European populations is very pronounced. As you see these aliens leading their lives according to habits that have grown up across the sea you might well wonder, as you go from one district to another, each inhabited apparently by people differing wholly from the others, if, indeed, there be not here a multitude of races beyond the capacity of even this Nation to digest.

[Applause.]

In justice to Mr. Cockran, I desire to say he then gives his reasons why this Nation can digest such conditions.

Judge Goldfogle, ex-Member of Congress from New York, admitted in his argument before the committee against the bill that such congestion did exist in New York.

Doubtless we will find similar conditions in many other large centers of population. I believe such conditions are dangerous. This Republic can not long survive half American and half foreign. We must Americanize them or they will foreignize us. [Applause.]

I know, Mr. Chairman, that the literacy test is not a perfect test. No law is perfect. Individuals, who are all fallible, create and make the laws, and we can not expect perfection out of imperfection. The best thought of the Nation seems to have evolved the literacy test as equitable, just, and fair.

On account of the continuous flow of immigrants to this Nation, Congress, a few years ago, appointed a commission to make a thorough investigation and determine whether or not it was necessary that immigration be restricted. This commission, after years of study and travel, decided that immigration should be restricted, and recommended the following methods of restriction:

The exclusion of those unable to read or write some language.
The limitations of the number of each race arriving each year to a certain percentage of the average of that race arriving during a given period of years.
The exclusion of unskilled laborers, unaccompanied by wives or families.
The limitation of the number of immigrants arriving annually at any port.
The material increase in the amount of money required to be in the possession of the immigrant at the port of arrival.
The material increase of the head tax.
The levy of the head tax so as to make a marked discrimination in favor of men with families.

A large majority of the commission favored the reading-and-writing test as wise and effective.

THE HEBREWS.

The Hebrews in my district and State, who are splendid citizens, have protested against the literacy clause, but an examination of the records will disclose that they will be scarcely affected if this measure becomes a law.

I am a great admirer of the Jew. Hosmer, the historian, says of them:

It is the marvel of history that this little people, beset and despised by all the earth for ages, maintains its solidarity unimpaired. Unique among all the peoples of the earth, it has come undoubtedly to the present day from the most distant antiquity. * * *
The most powerful races have not been able to assimilate them—the bitterest persecution, so far from exterminating them, has not eradicated a single characteristic. * * *
Language, literature, customs, traditions, traits of character—these, too, have all survived. * * *
There is no other case of a nation dispersed in all parts of the world and yet remaining a nation. * * *
Who will deny to the Jews preeminent force of passion and intellect in the most various directions?

If the bill was enforced strictly in accordance with the following provision—

All aliens over 16 years of age, physically capable of reading, who can not read the English language or some other language or dialect, including Hebrew or Yiddish—

it would only keep out 18 per cent male and 30 per cent female of the Hebrews.

On the other hand, the following liberal exemption certainly makes ample provisions:

All aliens who shall prove to the satisfaction of the proper immigration officer or to the Secretary of Labor that they are seeking admission to the United States to avoid religious persecution in the country of their last permanent residence, whether such persecution be evidenced by overt acts or by laws or governmental regulations that discriminate against the alien or the race to which he belongs because of his religious faith.

In that event the literacy test does not apply.

The Commissioner General of Immigration, in his report for 1915, shows that last year 19,703 Hebrews over 14 years of age immigrated to this country. Only 765 males and 2,223 females of this number could not read and write.

Many of these could have probably taken advantage of the foregoing provision. Many of the females certainly could take advantage of the exemption from the literacy test, which is as follows:

Provided, That any admissible alien, or any alien heretofore or hereafter legally admitted, or any citizen of the United States, may bring in or send for his father or grandfather over 55 years of age, his wife, his mother, his grandmother, or his unmarried or widowed daughter, if otherwise admissible, whether such relative can read or not, and such relative shall be permitted to enter.

THE FARMER.

A distinguished North Carolina capitalist, writing me opposing this bill, said:

The counties which you represent are an empire in themselves if developed, but they can not be developed without bringing in new population.

I wrote him stating that I was very much interested in the development of my district and State, that I heartily welcomed the moral, the thrifty, and the worthy immigrant, but seriously objected to the undesirable, the criminal, the anarchist, the ignorant, and the vicious, and that I was of the opinion that we ought to have moderate restriction.

I recognize the fact that I represent a vast territory of undeveloped farm lands, and I would like to see bursting from its bosom the golden grain, the fleecy staple, and other products of the soil; but rather than disturb the peace, the contentment, the happiness of my people by a horde of ignorant foreigners unfitted for our citizenship I had rather the soil remain in woodland, weeds, and grass.

As a matter of fact, I do not believe this bill, if enacted into law, will retard our growth or development.

The last annual report of the Bureau of Immigration shows that out of a total immigration last year of 434,244 aliens only 9,215 were farmers and 29,247 were classified as farm laborers. They prefer remaining in the congested districts of the larger cities. The farmers themselves are in favor of a restriction. The National Farmers' Union passed the following resolution:

Whereas the Immigration Commission, after eight years of investigation and a 42-volume report, recommended legislation contained in a 58-page bill that passed the Senate and House during the last Congress, only to fail by a few votes to receive the necessary two-thirds in the House needed to make it a law over a 12-line veto, after it had passed the Senate by the decisive vote of 72 to 18; and
Whereas the same bill has been introduced recently in the Senate by the chairman of the Senate Committee on Immigration and in the House by the chairman of the House Committee on Immigration: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America in national annual convention assembled at Salina, Kans., this 4th day of September, 1913, representing over 3,000,000 members throughout 33 States, That we reiterate our earnest demand for this needed legislation and urge upon the President and Members of the Senate and House that this bill, which is Senate 2453 and H. R. 6060, be put upon the Federal statute books at the earliest possible opportunity.

In November, 1914, the National Grange, a farmers' organization, adopted the following:

Among the thinking people of America there is an unusually strong feeling that the time has come when our immigration laws should be further amended so as to prevent the ignorant, dishonest, vicious, and physically defective from entering our country. While recognizing that ignorance is not a badge of dishonesty and crime, we are satisfied that the higher the average education of our people the better it is for our happiness, prosperity, and stability. When the war now raging on the Continent is over Europe will unquestionably dump untold numbers of undesirables upon our shores. The better element from those countries will not be permitted to leave, if such can be prevented.
Therefore we demand the passage by Congress of such immigration laws as will adequately protect our present citizenship from those of other countries whose mode of living, ideals, and beliefs are inimical to those which have made us great.

I believe if this legislation is enacted, it will give us a better class of immigrants, and those desiring to engage in farming will then be better equipped for this kind of work because of their educational qualifications.

Quoting from the brief of the Immigration Restriction League:

The passing of this law will be good politically, socially, and educationally.
The literacy test would largely cut down the number of undesirable immigrants, thus promoting the assimilation of other immigrants.
It would improve the quality of immigration.
It is a certain and definite test, easily applied.
Elementary education on the part of the immigrants is desirable.
The illiteracy test is demanded by intelligent public opinion.

The farmers want the legislation, the workingmen want it, and I believe an overwhelming majority of the people favor it. I know that the preservation, perpetuity, and glory of the American Republic demands that we guard well our gateways.

Wide open and unguarded stand our gates,
And through them pass a wild, a motley throng—
Men from the Volga and the Tartar steppes,
Featureless figures of the Hoang-Ho,
Malayan, Scythian, Teuton, Kelt, and Slav,
Flying the Old World's poverty and scorn;
These bringing with them unknown gods and rites;
Those tiger passions here to stretch their claws.
In street and alley, what strange tongues are these?
Accents of menace alien to our air;
Voices that once the tower of Babel knew!
O Liberty, white goddess, is it well
To leave the gate unguarded? On thy breast
Fold sorrow's children, soothe the hurts of fate,
Lift the downtrodden, but with the hand of steel
Stay those who to thy sacred portals come
To waste the gift of freedom. Have a care
Lest from thy brow the clustered stars be torn
And trampled in the dust, for so of old
The thronging Goth and Vandal trampled Rome,
And where the temples of the Cæsars stood
The lean wolf unmolested made her lair.

[Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, when I have consumed 10 minutes, if I consume so much time, I desire the Chair to call it to my attention.

Mr. Chairman, there is in this bill a provision of the greatest interest and importance to the people of the State which I represent in part on this floor. On page 7 will be found a provision which is intended to relate exclusively to the oriental peoples beyond the Pacific Ocean. That provision, in substance, is this: That the Hindu, who claims to be a Caucasian, shall be excluded, and all other peoples who, under our naturalization laws, are ineligible to become citizens of the United States, unless their exclusion is provided for by agreements as to passports, treaties, or conventions now existent or which may hereafter be entered into.

There is another amendment to the law which I know will also be very pleasing to the people of the Pacific coast, and that is that, although the bill excepts from the exclusion provision merchants, students, travelers, religious teachers, and scientific men, all of whom may come freely to this country, when any person belonging to one of these excepted classes ceases to maintain in this country the status which entitled him to enter and joins the ranks of labor he becomes deportable under the law.

Now, if I understood the reference of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] to this bill as a menace, I want to say to the gentleman that this bill does not change existing conditions in reference to any Asiatic who comes or has been coming to the United States except the Hindu. He is the only man whose status will be changed by this bill. It will not change the so-called Japanese gentleman's agreement at all, but explicitly recognizes it as in full force and operation. I was familiar—much more familiar than the gentleman from New York—with the inception of that gentleman's agreement with Japan, because I was called in consultation before it was made, and I know from knowledge thus acquired that that agreement was then acceptable to the Japanese Government. The Committee on Immigration and Naturalization has not formulated and proposed this addition to the law in regard to orientals without taking into consultation the Secretary of State and the various executive officers of the Government who are familiar with present conditions. They have advised us that they do not see that the provision could be offensive or objectionable to the Japanese or any other Government. I myself see nowhere any menace in this amendment to the law. I would be very loath to vote for any provision that would be an offense to the pride or sensibilities of any nation on the face of the globe, though I could not be deterred by this from taking such action as would fully protect us from any threatened oriental immigration menace.

In this connection I want to say that the people of California and the people of the Pacific coast generally have no ill will toward the people of Japan or any other Asiatic country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania and Mr. BENNET rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. HAYES. I yield first to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am glad the gentleman has referred to that paragraph. It seems to me to be one of the most serious in the bill. As I construe it, it seems a challenge or a menace.

Mr. HAYES. Not at all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And if the gentleman has any authority as to the attitude of the Japanese Government I wish he would state it?

Mr. HAYES. We have the authority of the Secretary of State. That is the only authority we have. We took this matter up with the Secretary of State before this provision was incorporated in the bill, as the committee were unanimously of the opinion that we do not desire under present conditions to include in the bill anything that would be seriously offensive to the Japanese or any other Government or people.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask whether it was the former Secretary of State?

Mr. HAYES. It was not. It was the present Secretary of State.

As I have said, the people of California and the Pacific coast generally cherish no ill will toward the Asiatic at this time, and I know I speak advisedly. They admire the Japanese people and their energy and progress. In proof of this I want to say that I know of no case in California where any citizen of the Japanese Empire has been insulted or abused, or assaulted or killed because he was a Japanese. No such incident has occurred in our State except as it might have occurred between Caucasians. There is no antipathy, as some people here think, against the Japanese people as a race.

The only motive that actuates the people of the Pacific coast in this matter is the desire to protect themselves, first, from the menace of the oriental in a commercial sense. Our people can not compete with them. The oriental can work and live and grow rich at a wage upon which the Caucasian would starve. That is our first consideration. And the second is fully as important to us, and that is that we do not desire to see imported upon the Pacific coast another great race problem. We want all the races that are not akin to ours to be excluded if they are liable to come to our shores in large numbers. We are perfectly willing that the students, the travelers, the scientific men, and business men of Japan, and all the Orient shall be allowed to come to this country freely. We have no objection to this, and many would have no objection to the laborers coming, only that we know if they are allowed to come it means that the Pacific coast would soon be submerged and overwhelmed by oriental immigration, just as the Hawaiian Islands have been overwhelmed. That is the reason why, upon every possible occasion, we are insisting upon provisions of some kind that will take care of us.

I want to say, in addition, that the people of the Pacific coast are grateful to the Empire of Japan and to its Government that the gentlemen's agreement above referred to has been kept in such good faith, and that the laborers of Japan by that agreement and by the action of the Government of Japan itself have been prevented from overwhelming us on the Pacific coast. We are grateful to them for this, and I feel that it is due to the officials of Japan that this should be stated publicly at this time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I can not discuss this bill in detail as I would like to without more time. I do want to say, however, that this bill is not aimed at any particular element of the Caucasian race. It is not aimed at any religion. The illiteracy test, so strongly objected to by some, affects only one class of people, and that is the class that is ignorant and generally stupid. That is all. It has been said here that there is just as much intelligence among the aliens who can not read as there is among those who can. I deny it. I have had a large experience as an employer of labor and in living among aliens in my earlier life, and I say to you that generally in this age in our public schools the children of the aliens who can not read are not up in development and intelligence with the children of those who can read. The conditions of this day are very different from what they were 50, 75, or 100 years ago. To-day, with all the books and newspapers in the world everywhere, there is no excuse in most of the nations of the world for any man who comes to the years of manhood without being able to read in his own language except his stupidity or lack of ambition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] has consumed 10 minutes of time.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, if it is permissible in the Committee of the Whole, I would like to ask general permission for the extension of remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not permissible in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, in the few moments at my command I can present but two or three statements in behalf of the need for a restriction of immigration and in behalf of this particular measure, the Burnett bill. All who have given the matter any thought agree that if restriction of immigration is not now actually necessary there will some day come when such a step must be taken. Nearly all of those who appeared at the hearings of the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization in opposition to this bill admitted that the time must come when the United States shall cease to be an asylum for the oppressed peoples of all the world. Others admit that the time has now come for restriction, but contend that the literacy test is not the best method to adopt in order to curtail the hordes that were pouring in for a number of years prior to the outbreak of the European war, and who will again, in my opinion, come pouring in at the conclusion of that fearful struggle.

The opposition to the literacy test seems based on sentiment chiefly—except, of course, the opposition of those who, for various reasons, oppose all restriction of immigration, and find the literacy test a convenient peg upon which to hang their opposition. But, as those who at first blush reject the literacy test as unfair, study the question, they find it not unfair. If we are to restrict at all, we must have some method. The percentage restriction will not do for it will admit liberal numbers of all the oriental races, races with which we can not assimilate, and which most of us agree should not be permitted to secure a further foothold in the States of this Union. An excessive head tax is not desirable, as it is subject to more objection than this simple, so-called literacy test, which requires aliens coming in to be able to read 30 to 40 words in his native language or jargon—40 simple words in any tongue the new arrival may select.

The bill exempts grandfathers and fathers beyond a certain age. It exempts the young. It permits those religiously or politically persecuted to come in if they can not read even one single word. Can any restrictive test be as fair? The danger is, in my opinion, that the test will not be sufficient to keep out as many as its hopeful advocates wish. But it is a step toward restriction, and if enacted into law it will mean those nonpersecuted persons who can not read one single line will not start for America. The steamships will not bring them. It will stop the influx from that great area around Constantinople. But even those, if persecuted, can come.

Mr. Chairman, I am glad my colleague from California [Mr. HAYES] has called attention to the clause by which we would prohibit the entrance of the Hindu to the United States. James J. Hill, known as the "empire builder," the constructor of a great railroad across our continent, is reported to have said that, speaking for himself, that he would like to see 250,000 Chinese come to the United States, inasmuch as he thought we needed them to do our work. Mr. Hill is reported also to have said that China has solved problems that we have not even attempted to solve, among them the problem of living on 10 or 12 cents a day. God forbid that the United States shall have to solve such a problem in the next thousand years.

A short time ago Mr. Hill had a scheme to fill both sides of our boundary line, from St. Paul to Seattle, with Hindu laborers, to work at 40 cents or 50 cents a day. That proposed importation of Asiatic labor was stopped only through the prodigious efforts of the present Commissioner General of Immigration, Mr. Caminetti, aided by leading citizens of the Pacific Northwest, who induced the steamship companies to cease bringing Hindus until some legislation, as proposed in section 3 of this bill. So much for the Asiatic question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. HAYES. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I presume that every Member in this House read in the Washington Star published last Wednesday, March 22, the story of the digger of graves in Arlington Cemetery, employed by the United States Government at $40 a month, who broke down and cried while trying to tell a committee of the House that he was endeavoring to support his family—a wife and two children—on the wages which he is receiving. He testifies that he can buy them only beans and hominy; never meat.

Five dollars of that forty dollars he is required to pay out in going to and from his work as a gravedigger. He is an American. That is a standard that I had hoped would never come to the United States, and yet it is already here in the very shadow of the great dome of the Capitol of the United States. [Applause.] Every Member of Congress must have felt some qualms when he read that story. Every Member must have felt instinctively that something is wrong somewhere.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. Is it, in the gentleman's opinion, the direct fault of Congress that the gravedigger he refers to is working for only $40 a month?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. When such a condition is brought to the attention of Congress or to a committee of Congress, some one always says that somebody else is waiting to take the job.

Mr. BOOHER. Does not the gentleman think that it is the duty of Congress to appropriate a proper wage for such work?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; and I think if there would be more difficulty in finding a man to work for $40 a month he would get more pay.

Mr. BOOHER. Will he get more under the terms of this bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. He will get less, I may say to the gentleman, if the United States continues to permit great numbers of foreigners from Constantinople and the country thereabouts to come in and bid for such jobs.

Mr. BOOHER. It will be the fault of Congress if that is done, because Congress has control of the law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will always vote against paying him only $40.

But, Mr. Chairman, the Arlington Cemetery grave diggers, janitors, and employers in customhouses and post offices all over the country receive only $55 a month. Out West they can not live for that, neither can they live on an American standard anywhere else in the country for that. Mail carriers, and substitute carriers particularly, are woefully underpaid. And to every outcry the answer is always the same—that some one else is ready and willing to take the job.

Some employers seem to think the way to give labor a chance is to keep always employed three crews—one coming, one working, and one going. I have here a report on business and trade and general conditions, issued by the National City Bank of New York for February, 1916, in which the labor situation is discussed. It says:

> In nearly all the industries expansion is now limited by the labor supply, and manufacturers are bidding against each other for help. If they are not doing so directly within the same industries, there is a sharp competition between the industries. The textile mills, in which perhaps wages have advanced less in recent years than in some other lines, complain of losing people to other employments. A general increase of about 5 per cent has been granted in the mills.

Now, my friends, I believe that when manufacturers and employers compete for men to labor, labor has a chance to exist and advance in the United States, and not unless such a condition does exist. As I just said, I am opposed to that form of business that wants one gang of men coming and another working and another going. That is what keeps the workingman down. I have never been opposed to legitimate big business. I believe that without big business we can not have little business, and without business we can not have jobs and prosperity. I believe, too, that all business should have a chance for a legitimate profit.

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman spoke of laborers coming here from abroad and then going back. Does the gentleman hold that those remaining here affect the wages of employees?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I feel sure that that is so. Too many men for the job never yet increased wages. The City Bank report from which I have just read complains that the industries in February were competing among each other for labor. Does anyone contend that that is a bad condition? The war abroad has made some factories go day and night. The war abroad has cut down the influx of aliens. The factory owners are making big money, and the money centers are alarmed because the industries are competing among each other for men to help those industries make money. If immigration is resumed after the war, the competition for labor will speedily end.

It was stated a few moments ago that no one could say what the prospects would be at the conclusion of the European war as to whether we should have or should not have heavy European immigration. I want to read to you an extract from the Jewish Bulletin of January, 1916.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has again expired.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This Jewish Bulletin says, under the caption of "Immigration situation in Seattle":

> As a direct result of the war, a situation has developed with surprising suddenness in Seattle, Wash., to meet which required immediate and energetic effort on the part of the Hebrew Sheltering and Immigrant Aid Society of America.

It goes on to say that several hundred Hebrews had recently come there from Russia. I read:

> Suddenly, like a bolt from the blue, Jewish refugees began landing in great numbers. Within less than two months several hundred immigrants had arrived, practically all from Russia. They had come by way of Vladivostok and Harbin, Siberia, and Yokohama, Japan, the only available route afforded them at the present moment of entering the United States. These brought the news that about 500 Russian Jews were in Japanese ports awaiting passenger accommodations to this country.

This situation so upset the city of Seattle, a place of some 300,000 people, that the Jewish people there were obliged to call upon their associates in New York to take care of that immigration which had come in by the back way, as it were. Some of them were actual deserters from the Russian Army.

Mr. Chairman, straws show which way the wind blows, and, in my opinion, the war in Europe will be followed by much of just such immigration as that, not only from Russia but from all countries. Can we care for all who may come?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has again expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, one of the most interesting statements made before the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization at its recent hearings was the statement of the Hon. Bourke Cockran, of New York, formerly a Member of this body. He is opposed to the literacy test, and he is opposed to this bill, and yet he stated that he foresaw that the necessity for restriction of immigration would arrive. In his opening remarks Mr. Cockran said:

> I think it is entirely safe to say that millions of human beings in other lands have been enabled to sustain conditions harsh beyond our power to conceive merely because over where the sun was setting beyond the Atlantic they knew there was a country that offered them hospitality and opportunity to enjoy in security all that they could produce by their industry.

All agree, I think, with the distinguished gentleman. Hope sustains the humblest peasant in far-off Russia, just as it sustains that poor gravedigger over at Arlington. Both are wondering, no doubt, where their children will find homes and how they shall exist. The gravedigger knows that the free public lands of the United States are about all gone; the peasant in Russia does not know it. The peasant thinks that he or his children might get to America. The gravedigger knows that he can not get to a sustaining western farm out West. He knows that no such farm is free to him, and he knows that he could not move if he wanted to.

Then Mr. Cockran proceeds—and I call your particular attention to this:

> But while that is a very attractive feature of this policy and affords abundant reason for patriotic rejoicing that it has been adopted by this country, yet we would be justified in continuing if it did not make for our own prosperity.

Now, then, my friends, the question is, Does a heavy influx of immigration make for our own prosperity? I think not.

Then Mr. Cockran says to the members of the committee:

> You are not sworn to advance the interests of alien people; nor are you allowed, in my judgment, to consider their interests if considering them would in the slightest degree imperil the prosperity we have or becloud the prospects we enjoy.

Next he says:

> The proposition, as I understand it, which underlies this measure is that these immigrants arriving in this country tend to debase industrial conditions of life, because in some way or other they displace American laborers—take the bread from their mouths. If that be so there could be no necessity for going any further. The justification for this bill would be complete.

And that, so far as I am concerned, states the situation. Our cities are jammed. The newly arrived aliens flock among themselves in them, according to nationality, read their own papers, attend their own schools. Our good free public lands are either mostly all taken or locked up in great reserves—laid aside for posterity. We can not invite the immigrant as we used to 100 years ago, 60 years ago, or even 25 years ago. Our opportunities for the foreigner are disappearing. And those of the old class of immigrants know it and do not come as freely as of yore. The newer immigration is not so desirable, not so adaptable, and not so amenable. They come in droves and are herded into jobs to the disadvantage of the children of those who came before and to the detriment, I believe, of the country.

I regret that I can not quote further from Mr. Cockran's argument. He contends that every man who comes does common labor that creates a job for the man next above him, and that he never dislodges a man who has a job, but rather makes opportunity for more jobs. I can not agree with him. If times were always prosperous, if there was always abundance of work, it might be so, but I have noticed that even when times are good those who employ unskilled and semiskilled labor feel secure if they think that two men are available for every job. I have noticed, too, that even when times are good in the United States there are always in every town, every city, plenty of men who will take a gravedigger's job, or its equivalent, at $40 a month, to support wife and children in a manner that is not American and of which we can not be proud.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] is recognized.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, one of the great questions confronting the American people to-day is that of immigration. There is an unusually strong sentiment throughout the length and breadth of this country that the time has come when our immigration laws should be so amended as to prevent the thousands upon thousands of ignorant, dishonest, vicious, and physical defectives from entering our country.

I fully recognize that ignorance is not a badge of dishonesty or crime, but the higher the average of education of our own people, the better it is for our happiness, prosperity, and stability.

When the war that is now devastating Europe from the Euphrates to the Thames is over, and peace restored, there can be no doubt that Europe will dump untold numbers of undesirable aliens upon our shores. The better element from the countries now engaged in war will not be permitted to leave or else will not care to abandon their stricken land, but will give their time and attention to the rehabilitation of their war-swept countries, but the ignorant, vicious, and criminal will pour into this country as never before.

Such a thing should be prevented, and this bill, if enacted into law, will accomplish the desired results. Now is the accepted time for action.

Mr. Chairman, the provisions of the bill are not new to the American people. A similar bill has passed both branches of Congress three times, and its failure to become a law has been due to vetoes. The people are thoroughly conversant with the literacy test and demand that it be incorporated in the immigration law.

As evidence of the widespread sentiment in favor of restricted immigration with a literacy test, analyze the vote on the bill in February, 1913, when an effort was made to pass it over President Taft's veto, and also the vote on the veto of President Wilson in 1914. Let me quote to you from the committee's report on this subject, which says:

> In 1913, on the question of passing the bill over the veto, out of a possible 476 votes in both branches, only 131 were cast against passing the bill over the veto, 57 "not voting," and 2 "present." There was not a single vote against passing the bill over the veto from 18 States, namely, Alabama, Arizona, Idaho, Montana, New Hampshire, North Carolina, Tennessee, Vermont, Washington, Florida, Georgia, Mississippi, Nevada, Oklahoma, Oregon, Virginia, West Virginia. Both Senators and every Representative from the 10 States first named voted to pass the bill over the veto. Twenty-one States were divided in their vote, but did not cast a majority against passing over the veto. In only 9 States—Illinois, Iowa, Louisiana, Minnesota, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North Dakota, and Wisconsin—were a majority of the delegation in favor of sustaining the veto, and in these cases it was only a bare majority; in Illinois, 13 out of 25; Iowa, 8 out of 13; Louisiana, 5 out of 9; Minnesota, 7 out of 11; New Jersey, 7 out of 12; New Mexico, 3 out of 4; New York, 19 out of 37; North Dakota, 2 out of 3; Wisconsin, 7 out of 13.
> The vote by which the Burnett bill passed the House in February, 1914, and in the Senate January 2, 1915, shows the same demand of the people for this legislation. The fight against the bill was the hardest ever made (the measure was fully debated for five days), so that this vote registers the deliberate feeling of the Members as to the merits of the question and the wishes of their constituents. From 21 States every vote cast was for the bill; 13 gave a majority for the bill; 3 split even; 6 gave a majority against the bill; and only 4 voted solidly against the bill—Connecticut, New Mexico, Rhode Island, Utah—or 10 votes.
> Of 256 Democrats voting, 166 voted for the bill; of 106 Republicans, 71 voted for the bill; 14 out of 15 Progressives, and 1 Independent voted for it. The majority in its favor was, therefore, made up of 76 Democrats, 36 Republicans, 13 Progressives, and 1 Independent (KENT).
> The 21 State for the bill were Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Kansas, Mississippi, Montana, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, Wyoming—or 100 votes.
> In view of much that is alleged as to the demand of the South and West for immigration, it is interesting to note that the vote in favor of the bill was: Southern States, 78 to 6; Southwestern States 33 to 9; Northwestern States and the coast, 38 to 14; the Pacific coast alone being 17 to 1.

The people of this country have become aroused on this subject, and in response to the sentiment of their respective States the Legislatures of Arkansas (house), California, Massachusetts (house), Nevada, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, and Wyoming have passed resolutions indorsing legislation of this kind. Not only have the legislatures of various States become active, but important bodies throughout this country have also indorsed it. It has the indorsement of the American Federation of Labor, Knights of Labor, Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union, Farmers' National Congress, United Mine Workers, National Board of Trade, National Grangers, Order of United American Mechanics, Junior Order of United American Mechanics, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Brotherhood of Railway Train-men, United Textile Workers, Cotton Growers' Association, and 40 boards of associated charities in our largest cities.

These organizations, representing millions of American citizens, favor and demand that Congress amend the present immigration laws so as to prohibit the ignorant, vicious, and criminal aliens from landing upon our shores.

Mr. Chairman, from whence comes the opposition to this bill? It has its origin at some source. A portion of it emanates from the trust-owned steamboat companies, whose coffers are annually filled to the extent of over $60,000,000 for bringing and carrying back again the immigrants who come to our shores.

It also comes from the employers of cheap labor, who are trying to reduce the American laboring man's wages by the employment of cheap foreign labor. The large corporations of this country want this class of immigrants, because they want cheap labor, and an easy way to get cheap labor in the United States is by having plenty of foreign labor to compete with American labor.

These corporations, who are opposed to the strengthening of our present immigration law with a literacy test, have no thought as to the effect upon American labor that this influx of ignorant immigrants may have in reducing the standard of American ideals, American politics, American labor, and American citizenship. Nothing is further from their minds. These corporations, secure in the possession of great wealth, the individuals who constitute them, as well as their families and caste associates, have no fear of any undesirable effect from such a source, in so far as they themselves are concerned. They are members of the moneyed aristocracy of America; they expect that they and their posterity will ever be above association with the classes that would be affected.

Were it possible for these moneyed lords and barons, these plutocrats, who desire cheap labor, they would have the laws repealed that exclude Chinese and Japanese from our shores, and would, in addition to welcoming the ignorant immigrants of Europe, open wide the doors of admission to the hordes of Asiatic coolies. What care they about the standard of American wages, the standard of American ideals, the standard of American citizenship, and the standard of American politics. Greed and vanity predominate their very souls, and to them the ideal economic conditions are those that would reduce the great mass of the country's wage earners to such a condition of subjection and semistarvation as to make them ready to do servile homage to the wealthy. The only persons in America who are benefited by the invasion of these undesirable, ignorant, criminal, and vicious immigrants are those who employ them at a lower wage than they would have to pay for American labor.

The American wage earners throughout the length and breadth of this country, wherever they may be, whether it be in the shops, the factories, or deep down in the capacious bosom of Mother Earth bringing forth the hidden metal, or out on our broad fields of agriculture, have no objection to the worthy immigrant. A hearty welcome is extended to those who come honestly seeking a home under our flag, a refuge from oppression of tyrannical monarchial Governments of the Old World.

As the corporations have no care for the protection of American labor and have preyed upon it more ferociously than did the vulture that preyed upon the vitals of Prometheus, Congress should certainly have more regard for the common citizenship of the United States than to permit American labor to be brought into constant competition with this class of immigrants. Numbers of undesirable immigrants are at present, and have for years in the past, been swarming to this country, and labor should be protected from this kind of competition. The "infant industries" have been protected by an outrageously high tariff law for years, and the protection afforded to them by Congress has enabled the fully developed mammoth trusts, which, being thus guarded from competition from abroad, have enjoyed a monopolistic control of the necessities of life at home, and, without any restraint whatever, have extracted from the masses of the people prices vastly in excess of what those commodities should sell for, without due regard to a fair profit to the producers and the middleman.

Mr. Chairman, the American wage earner, whose hands are calloused by hard and honest toil and whose back has been scourged by the lash of greed, has received no such consideration at the hands of Congress. Far from protecting American labor by a tariff of any kind or giving to it any protection, the freest and fullest competition has been maintained throughout the practically unrestricted influx of foreigners without any regard as to their desirability as American citizens. For many years ignorant, illiterate foreigners have been coming in millions to the United States, the vast majority of them being entirely oblivious as to the history of the country and the character of its institutions and absolutely indifferent as to their purposes.

The influence of large corporate employing interests has in the past and are now operated to prevent the enactment of legislation to restrict such immigration.

Mr. Chairman, foreign immigration ebbs and flows like the ever-restless waves of the sea. It follows the prosperity of the country, and as a consequence the American laborer is the last to feel the high tide of good times. The alien is given preference in employment because he will work for less. And the American laborer is given the crumbs that fall from Dives's tables. He is given what is left and oftentimes made to go without a job.

When adversity sets in, and the depression becomes general throughout this country, as it did during the panic of 1907, about the first to be reduced from service is the American laborer, because the corporations know that the foreigner will be more contented to remain at work under conditions and for wages which would be unbearable to the American workman.

When the time comes that the depression finally reaches the alien worker, he packs his belongings in a red bandana handkerchief and starts back to his native land, with his earnings rolled up in a wad and tucked out of sight about his person. This drain upon the resources of our country and this competition which our American workmen are forced to meet should be stopped.

The influx of unskilled labor should be checked either by imposing a larger head tax or by a literacy test, or some other test that will prevent them from being brought into competition with American labor. The American laborer, who by his toil earns his bread in the sweat of his face, has penetrated the depths of the forests bristling with giant oaks and soughing pines, which have bowed their heads to his arm, and in their stead to-day golden grain and snow-white cotton respond to every shifting breeze. Mountains that have frowned down upon humanity for ages stand as silent sentinels to guard their hidden treasures; but when American labor knocks at the door their bowels are penetrated, and the locomotives that scream along their steel-ribbed ways carry forth the commerce of the world through the black-throated tunnels made by the hands of American labor.

Rivers that have been unnavigable for centuries, disgorge when American labor approaches, and where once naught but the birch-bark canoe American labor has built and put into motion a floating city of steamers to carry the products of labor along the shore to bless humanity and civilization.

American labor has contributed to the glory and grandeur of this Republic. They have given their best efforts to help make this Republic what it is. Civilization is the offspring of labor. There can be no civilization without labor first having preceded it. American labor has bared its breast to the storm of battle on fields of death and carnage in glorious defense of the country's flag, not only in our own country but on a foreign soil. He stands ready and willing to defend the flag of his country whenever danger imperils it. He has contributed much to this Government and will continue to do so as the years go by. He has the right to expect Congress to protect his labor; he has the right to expect Congress to close the doors of admission to the cheap labor of Europe which is his competitor.

Mr. Chairman, there are two classes of American citizens toward whom the Government, by its neglect to care for and protect their interests, has almost been guilty of criminal negligence. One is the American laborer and the other is the great American farmer. They elect no special representative to this body to plead their cause, but they rely upon that manhood and justice that should dwell within the breast of every Member elected. I enter here to-day a solemn protest on behalf of American labor being forced to compete with the cheap foreign labor that comes to this country through our present lax immigration laws.

The corporations, the large business interests, the moneyed institutions, and the favored classes have received special legislation advantageous to their business; but the American laborer and the American farmer, upon whose backs rest the burdens of the country and upon whose labor the prosperity of the Nation depends, have never been so favored.

The entrance of this foreign labor from southern and eastern Europe has exposed the original employees to unsafe and unsanitary conditions of employment; it has set a standard of living far below that of the native American; it has hindered and demoralized labor in all of its branches; it has led to the displacement of the highest class of labor formerly employed; and in a great many cases this employment of cheap foreign labor has been a cause of economic disasters and depredation. I point to the recent occurrence at Youngstown, Ohio, where over 15,000 foreign laborers were employed.

"Choose you this day whom ye will serve." You can not serve God and mammon; you can not serve two masters. Whom will you serve? Will it be the steamboat companies and the trust-owned corporations or shall it be the American people? For my part, Mr. Chairman, I cast my lot with the American people—the American wage earner—for I know his trials and tribulations; I know his joys and his sorrows; his cradle songs and funeral hymns have been my cradle songs and my funeral hymns, and every pulsation of my heart beats in harmony and unison with his. I thank God that I have an opportunity to-day to cast my vote to help raise the standard of American citizenship, the standard of American ideals, the standard of American politics, and the standard of American labor.

Mr. Chairman, there is no test which can be provided that will shut out every undesirable alien and admit every desirable one. A great many desirable immigrants by the literacy test will probably be denied admission to this country, and a great many undesirable ones will probably be admitted under the literacy test; but the present law lets in a very large number of aliens who are below the average both of our and their own country, and this is the object and purpose of this legislation to prohibit.

Ability to read is necessary for the understanding of American ideas and institutions, even down to health and police regulations. It is no answer to say that the children of aliens will be taught in our schools, because the children in many instances do not attend school, and the adults do not learn.

It can not be successfully claimed that ability to read is in itself a test of mental or moral character. The test would, nevertheless, go so far as to exclude the less desirable element of our present immigrants.

A literacy test is not un-American. It is not un-American to insist on education. We do it in the case of our own children. We spend in America millions upon millions of dollars annually to establish and equip and maintain a public-school system. We have applied the doctrine of the Apostle Paul, "Behold, I have set before you an open door and no man shall shut it," to the schoolhouses of this country. The hope and salvation of the Government rests upon the schoolhouse flying over its door the American flag and confined within its walls the Book of Books. By laws in a great many of our States our children are forced to take advantage of the open schoolhouse. We say to them, "You must take advantage of these schools. We do not consider you fit for adult participation in the life of this country unless you have the rudiments of an English education." Is it logical to say to the foreigner who comes without any knowledge of American life or ways, "It makes no difference whether you are educated or not; you will get along all right; but our own children, who are familiar with the customs of this country and its purposes, must be educated, but it is a matter of indifference about you."

Suppose a family of immigrants come to this country bringing a child. The child must be compelled in some States to go through the public schools, and then we would say he is fitted to enter into the active life of the Nation. If that same child remains in Europe and comes to this country at the age of 16 years, shall we say to him, "Education is a matter of indifference"? Under which condition would he need education the most? If he had grown up in this country, familiar with the customs, or if he has grown up in a foreign country?

I know that it will be claimed and argued with considerable force that the test of literacy is a test of opportunity and not of character, and that it will be un-American to test people on the basis of opportunity, but that we should judge them on the basis of character.

Giving, Mr. Chairman, my personal views of legislation of this kind I would like to see the test based not only on education but also on character, and this would eliminate a great many who can pass the educational requirement, but it can not be successfully contended that it is un-American to test people on the basis of opportunity if by "un-American" we mean that it is not in harmony with the established usage and custom of this country. In the present immigration law we have numerous tests. Take our pauper test. Many a pauper immigrant is deported because of meager opportunities in his youth, not because of any flaws in character. It is a test of opportunity applying primarily to people who have grown up in certain lands. There is the test of polygamy. The Hindu grows up in polygamous society and adopts that form of life just as naturally as those who grow up in European countries adopt the monogamous form of life. It can not be successfully contended that it is un-American to test people on the basis of opportunity. If we once start to try to sift out the characteristics of ourselves or anyone else, which are due to opportunity and separate them from those which are due to character or heredity, we have ourselves in a hopeless muddle, because after all, opportunity and environment, being one and the same, are closely bound up with heredity and character.

The only thing to be determined is what is necessary for the welfare of this Nation and to act on the facts as they exist. It is often said, "A man is not a better man because he can read or write." It is not claimed that ability to read is the test of moral worth or even, in some cases, industrial value, but in a law of this kind classes must be considered and not individuals.

Take the history of the immigrants, as reported by the Bureau of Immigration, and it discloses the fact that a large percentage of the immigrants in this country who are ignorant of languages are also ignorant of trades, are of poor physique, and are less thrifty. They tend to settle in and create the city slums, tend to become dependents upon public charities, and even if not actual criminals and paupers, they have little interest in this country and are unfitted for citizenship in a free and enlightened republic. Let the immigrant who desires to cast his lot here and enjoy the blessings of a free government take at least the trouble to acquire the slight amount of training necessary to satisfy the requirement of section 3 of this bill and thus show that he appreciates the privilege he seeks to share.

Mr. Chairman, the democratic nations of the world and nations with democratic tendencies have long ago inaugurated public-school systems through which their citizens go, and consequently they contain a lower percentage of illiteracy, compared to those undemocratic, in thought or ideas. The democratic nations have a higher percentage of literacy, so that illiteracy appears not so much of an evil in itself as an indication of the different conditions in which illiterates have grown up and conditions which we count to be necessary in this country. The illiterate groups tend to be those who are the most difficult to assimilate; most difficult to harmonize into the life of this country. The reason is simple. They have not been trained in democracy, consequently they are the groups that should be reduced in number as we admit them to our shores.

The mere threat of a literacy test, I am informed on good authority, two years ago started schools upon the vine-covered hillsides of southern and central Italy, where there had been none before, and when the bill failed the schools were closed. What greater service can we render than to establish a standard which will stimulate the progress of popular education in foreign lands?

Mr. Chairman, I understand that in 1909, the officers charged with the enforcement of the present immigration law applied to the incoming immigrants a literacy test—that is, they asked each one entering the different ports of this country if he could read. No actual test was made, and in that connection let me quote to you a portion of a speech made before the Immigration Committee by the distinguished author of this bill in 1910. He says:

> The Bohemians over 14 years of age who came last year were 11,015 in number; of that entire 11,015 there were only 216 over 14 years of age who could not read.

Those are all that would be cut out, Mr. Chairman. Then you take the Finnish. While they are Russian citizens, in a Russian country, they are up there contiguous to the Scandinavians, to Norway and Sweden, and they are virtually of the same class of people. Although they are under the same laws with many of the illiterates of Russia, although they have the same king and the same legislative bodies, of the 13,893 who came only 351 were illiterates.

Take the English, and of 43,144 who came there were only 536 illiterates. Of the French, of 8,390 who came there were only 170 illiterates. Of the Germans, of 78,091 who came there were only 5,310 illiterates. Of the Greeks, of 45,464 who came—I mean over 14 years of age in each of these statements—there were 13,883 that could not read a word, even of their own language. And here in passing, let me remark, Mr. Chairman, that there were really more of each one of these nationalities that could not read than I have stated, because no test was applied to them. The mere question is asked by the men in charge of the immigration stations as to whether they can read or write or not. Then these people state, without any test being applied, as to whether they are able to read or write, and no doubt many of them state falsely as to this.

Of the Irish there were 36,463 that came who were over 14 years of age and only 713 of them were unable to read. Of the north Italians—now, here I want to call your attention again to the difference between the north and the south Italians. Of the north Italians there were 47,555 who came and only 4,741 were unable to read, about 10 per cent. Of the south Italians there were 217,607 who came and 115,803 of them over 14 years of age were unable to read. Of the Russians there were 16,000 in round numbers who came and there were 6,998 who were unable to read. Of the Scandinavians there were 47,500 who came and only 475 who were unable to read. Of the Scotch there were 17,274 who came and of the illiterates there were only 149; while of the Syrians there were 5,216 who came and of that number there were 2,870 who were unable to read.

This test proves conclusively, to my mind, the wisdom of this law.

It will be seen by this test that the larger percentage of illiterates come from southern Europe, from such countries as Greece, Italy, and a portion of Russia.

Applying the same percentage of illiterates that entered in 1909 to the number of immigrants from these countries entering in 1914, the passage of this law would exclude about 50 per cent of the Italians, about 40 per cent of the Greeks, about 30 per cent of the Russians.

From 1820 to 1914, 32,027,424 immigrants have entered this country, and, according to the annual report of the Commissioner of Immigration during the year 1914, 251,612 came from southern Italy, 138,051 came from Greece, 174,365 came from Poland, 51,472 from Roumania. Prior to 1882 the overwhelming majority of the immigrants that came to this country were from northern Europe and were the type of immigrants that have helped develop this country and made it what it is to-day. They sought this country as a home from political and religious persecution, but since that time the best type of citizenship of Europe has ceased to come. To-day the country is being flooded annually with over a million immigrants, the major portion of them coming from countries of southern Europe. It is this type that this bill will exclude. We could not exclude them by race or nationality, as probably it might involve some treaty rights of this country, but we are clearly within our rights when we specify certain tests that must be complied with before any immigrant, it makes no difference from what country he comes, can be admitted to this country.

Mr. Chairman, our naturalization laws do not require that the alien be able to read and write before taking the oath and becoming a citizen of this Republic. When he becomes a citizen of this Republic he is given the privilege of the franchise. Ability to read is absolutely necessary for the intelligent use of the franchise. The ignorant, criminal, and vicious immigrants, fresh from scenes of oppression and environment that operate to help develop brute instincts and to stifle the better instincts of their nature, after being naturalized, care little about our institutions and are entirely indifferent as to their character and perpetuity. They congregate in the slums of our large cities and become the tools of the political bosses who, through the agents of the padrone, utilize their collective voting strength to fortify and perpetuate the corrupt political machines which dominate the politics of some of the large cities of the country. The ignorant voter is the bulwark, the mainstay, and support of the political machine and by his vote oftentimes even controls the politics of the State.

If it be true that the proper study of mankind is man, it is equally true that the proper study of the citizen is his Government. In our Republic, unless one knows the theory upon which it is founded, unless one knows the principles by which it is maintained, unless he has a knowledge of the duty and responsibility of citizenship in it, he can not be a good citizen. We should all know and understand that the weal or woe of our country, for its glory or its shame, rests upon the individual citizen. What does the ignorant naturalized citizen know about the principles of this Government? What does he care for the weal or woe or the glory or shame of this Nation? Does he raise the standard of American life, the standard of American wages, the standard of American politics? He does not; but, on the contrary, he lowers each one of them. He has but one hope and purpose in view, and that is to enrich himself and take back to his native land the riches of his temporary sojourn here.

Let me tell you, sir, that a large percentage of the immigrants reaching our shores to-day and that have come in recent years and that have become naturalized and been given the right of American citizenship, the greatest blessing that can be bestowed upon mankind, are of such a type that the countries from which they come are better for their leaving. Among some of the ignorant aliens that have been naturalized are to-day to be found the most dangerous, conscienceless, and brutal criminals that are at large, and while our present immigration law makes a pretense of excluding the criminal element, it is an absolute impossibility for the officers charged with the execution of these laws to exercise sufficient vigilance to detect the criminals amongst such a vast conglomerate number.

If this constant inflow of immigrants is not stopped our great cities will soon be hardly American.

This is one blessing in disguise the negro has been to the people of the South, the fact that by his simple presence in the Southland he has kept from our doors a considerable number of the overwhelming tide of ignorant and degenerate immigrants that year by year have swept into America. This has enabled us to keep our Americanism pure and uncorrupted, as it was when first given in charge to us.

The immigrants arriving are not animated by the desire for a religious or political freedom in a self-governing Republic. They bring with them scenes of political and social conflicts in Europe; tendencies adverse to the American citizenship, American labor, and American principles of government.

The vast majority that arrive here do not look forward to establishing a permanent home in this country. They have been urged forward by misrepresentations of interested agents of transportation companies or deluded by the glowing description of friends and relatives who preceded them.

Mr. Chairman, to-day a majority of the nations of Europe are armed military camps and engaged in the most destructive war in the history of the world. They will soon be forced to the condition once so picturesquely described by that French statesman Gambetta, "a beggar at a barracks door."

The force and fury of the conflict now raging in Europe has shaken the very foundation of the earth, laid in the depth of ages, and it behooves us in this day of almost world war to take note of our bearing and see where the policies of this Nation are leading.

On more than one occasion within the last 15 months the war clouds have gathered upon our own country's horizon, and who can tell what the future may bring forth? Wars are contagious, and the neutral nations of to-day, before the conflict raging in Europe is ended, may be drawn into the whirlpool of destruction and war.

When we stop to think of the spirit that has grown up in this country in some quarters on account of the position this Government has taken in regard to maintaining its freedom of commerce and the protection of humanity upon the high seas it is astounding to know what efforts have been made, both direct and indirect, against this Government.

Why, sir, efforts have been made to destroy this very building in which we now legislate. It has become necessary to patrol and guard the tunnel beneath yonder Plaza. Even the Sergeant at Arms of this House, by special act of Congress, has been authorized to place additional police on the force to protect this building from injury and destruction. Yet we are at peace with all the nations of the earth. This spirit which seeks to place other governments above this Government by some citizens of this Republic who enjoy the blessings of this Nation is dangerous to a free Republic, for it strikes at the very foundation of the Government.

The time has come when we should know where we stand. Have we in the past, through our lax immigration laws, permitted the entrance of a Trojan horse?

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me say that in the great cities of the country, where the steamboat companies have their offices and agents, the defeat of this bill will be hailed with hilarious shouts of approval. In the moneyed centers and the offices of the trust-owned corporations, who have grown fat and rich from the oppression of American labor, they will receive with shouts of joy the defeat of this legislation; but, sirs, out on our broad fields where men, women, and children toil, and oftentimes in a mortgaged crop; out on the ever-receding waves of the restless ocean, where men drive the leviathans of the sea laden with commerce produced by the strong arm of toil throughout mills and black-throated factories; deep down under the earth, where men bring forth the hidden metal to cheer and gladden the hearts of mankind—these men, these women, and their children, weary with the care and toil in all walks of life, will bend their knee and offer a solemn prayer of thanks to the American Congress, should this bill become a law, as they know the passage of this legislation means the continued progress and prosperity of this American Republic; they know it means the elevation of the American citizenship; they know it means the purging of the corrupt political machines of the ignorant voter; they know it means that at last the shackles have been broken from the strong arm of labor; and, above all else, they know it means the preservation of our American ideas of government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. VINSON. I ask permission, Mr. Chairman, to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER].

Mr. BURNETT. And I yield him five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] is recognized for 25 minutes.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I shall not, in the time that has been allotted to me, discuss the administrative features of this bill. Some questions have already been raised by gentlemen who have preceded me that will be answered or explained as we go along in the reading of the bill. Suffice it to say that if there were no need for this legislation, the gentlemen who are not opposed to it should not fear it. If we are to have no influx of immigrants following the European war, there is no law that can do this country or the foreigner any particular harm.

It is true that for years past many of the splendid features that are in this bill have failed of being enacted into law because of the presence of a single item, namely, the literacy test. I believe that had that been left out much of what is proposed in this bill should have been law long ago, and it seems to me that at the present time we, as Members of this House, should candidly and frankly raise the question for our own Nation, and for no one outside of our country, as to what is the wise policy in regard to the literacy or illiteracy of those who are within our borders or who may come in. We have as much right to raise that question as we have to raise any other question that should be considered as a part of our national program.

LITERACY ESSENTIAL IN OUR GOVERNMENT.

Kingdoms, monarchies, and despotisms may continue with an illiterate population; democracies can not. [Applause.] Where the Government rests upon the people it may be better if they are not literate, but where the Government is the people we must have not simply intelligence but literacy if we expect to maintain our institutions. I am not here to say for one moment that there are not and have not been plenty of men born and reared in this country, and others who have come to this country, just as good in character and otherwise as some who were able to read; but the plea of the man who defends illiteracy, if followed to its logical conclusion, would mean the closing of every schoolhouse on every hillside in our Nation. You can not follow that argument to its last analysis. You can not make your plea for the illiterate without making your plea for illiteracy at the same time. We are facing the question of how much illiteracy we can permit in this country and at the same time maintain our American institutions. The man who stands in the American Congress and pleads for illiteracy, or the man who attempts to make this House or this Nation believe that this bill as it is brought to the House will mean the shutting out of all who might apply for admission, misleads the House and misleads the Nation. This is nothing more nor less than a selective program. It by no manner of means shuts out all who apply.

RELIGIOUS AND POLITICAL REFUGEE PROVIDED FOR.

As I shall mention a moment later, it has made special provision for those for whom the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] made such an eloquent plea, namely, the refugees from religious persecution and the refugees from political persecution. But, sirs, this afternoon we men had just as well face this——

Mr. SIEGEL. Will the gentleman point out anything in section 3 which will permit a person fleeing from political persecution to enter this country?

Mr. MEEKER. Page 9, line 13. The gentleman has read it many times.

Mr. SIEGEL. Will the gentleman yield——

Mr. MEEKER. I have no time to yield further. The gentleman will speak later on, will he not?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Well, the gentleman can take it up then.

Mr. SIEGEL. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. SIEGEL. Will the gentleman point out the page which admits people fleeing from political persecution?

Mr. MEEKER. Page 9, line 13, where it says:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall exclude, if otherwise admissible, persons convicted, or who admit the commission, or who teach or advocate the commission, of an offense purely political.

I can think of nothing more specific than that. We will vote on the bill later.

We are facing a question of policy. I will say to the gentleman from New York, if he can demonstrate that this does not admit a political refugee then I will vote for any amendment which he may bring in that will provide it. I would never vote for any bill that would deny admission into this country of any man who is seeking his religious or political liberty; and if it is not provided in this bill, let us provide it now, before the bill becomes a law.

Now, gentlemen, we have heard much talk to-day, and will hear much more as to the foreigner who may seek our shores, but we are forgetting some very vital things as regards our own national life. A gentleman in St. Louis, a friend of mine—Mr. Williams—some time ago in discussing this bill before a club said a rather significant thing. He said we should remember that this is a Nation and not a sewer. [Applause.] We have things to take into account as to ourselves; and I submit to the gentlemen this afternoon that if they can show me—and I am from Missouri—how in the political program of a democracy men who can not read our language, or any other language or dialect thereof, can ever hope to be anything other than the tools of commercial and political bosses, I would like to know where else they can find their place. [Applause.]

But they say that some men who are literate are criminals. Yes; that is true; and some who are not are criminals. But that does not solve anything. We Republicans on this side of the House have made many long and eloquent speeches about a protective tariff. We have appealed to the men who toil, saying to them, "Vote for us and we will put a law on the books that will shut out the cheap labor of Europe." This was a plank in the great protective platform of '96. I have been met from the platform time and again with the question from the fellow in the audience, "But how about permitting the cheap laborer to come here?" And I have never been able to answer that question. That is the weak spot in our armor at the present time. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has it ever occurred to the gentleman that labor is very well organized in the United States, and that this helps to maintain the wage of the worker in the United States?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And that the foreigner who comes here does not work for the foreign wage in the United States?

Mr. MEEKER. I am aware of that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That he works under the union wage scale in the United States?

Mr. MEEKER. Not always.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. MEEKER. Not by any manner of means. I am well aware of the fact that in some districts not very far from where we now are, in the coal mines and in the steel mills, it is the fly-by-night, ignorant foreigner, with his low standard of living, who beats the life out of the American workingman. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the gentleman familiar with the wages paid to the union worker in the mines of Pennsylvania?

Mr. MEEKER. I am not. Does the gentleman think those wages are too high?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not, but I think the unions maintain a fair standard of wages in Pennsylvania, and they have a great deal of force and effect there; and they do not usually let the alien get away with the trick there, I will tell the gentleman.

Mr. MEEKER. Well, the foreign labor in this country must be working somewhere, either in the mines or elsewhere.

Mr. BURNETT. Did the gentleman ever see the advertisement put in the papers in the gentleman's city a few years ago by one of the members of the Steel Trust, asking for laborers, which said "Italians preferred"?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know anything about the development of the garment workers in the city of New York or in the city of Philadelphia, and the wages paid to them?

Mr. MEEKER. Is the gentleman from Pennsylvania talking to the gentleman from Alabama or to me?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman heard of the union scale by which those garment workers obtain an increase wage for that class of labor? And also, has the gentleman ever heard of the wages paid to the cotton pickers and mill workers down in the State of Alabama?

Mr. MEEKER. I have, and I will say that if Alabama and the Southern States, where wages are low, had a higher grade of literacy, the wages would be higher. [Applause.]

ILLITERACY MEANS LOW WAGES.

You can not get away from the fact that illiteracy means low wages. You can not deny it. If it is not true, then your educational program is a farce and a sham. You are either for it or against it, and when you come in with the specious plea that we have not been able to hold up wages in any particular State by the organized union-labor movement, you know, just as surely as you know that we are men on the floor of this House, that it is the illiterate man who can be used to lower wages, and not the man who reads. We hear much said about the foreigner. I wish to say right here that the illiterate alien is the only individual in our Nation who can not be reached through any means or channel, and to whom information that is commonly used by men can not be brought. The foreign-language press of this country is doing a great work. Men little realize what that body of men is doing. More than 750 newspapers and magazines, circulating by the millions, teaching the great ideals of Americanism, talking to their people about fundamentals of life and liberty of this Nation, but they can not reach the illiterate countrymen who go up and down the land in herds. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, or any other State, can not deny but what it is in the herding of labor that the market is played, just the same in the labor market as it is in the cotton and the wheat market. [Applause.]

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. I can not yield any more.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman has not yielded to me yet.

Mr. MEEKER. Then I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SABATH. I want to ask the gentleman whether he is familiar with the wages of the laboring men in 1890 as compared with the wages that they are receiving now, after 10 or 12 years of the largest immigration in the history of the Nation. If he does not, I wish to say that it is 37 per cent higher now than before.

Mr. MEEKER. Well, Mr. Chairman, I could answer that easily in two or three ways, and the gentleman from Illinois knows it. First, during the past year we only had a net gain of 3,000 or 4,000. The European war shows us where the alien lives and who he is. It is rather a significant fact. I ask myself the question, Suppose the war had been declared on us 18 months ago, with nearly 400,000 unnaturalized men in our midst, what would have occurred? It would have been an interesting circumstance, to say the least, considering the fact that the emigration from this country during the war has been the best evidence that we should be a little more particular about our immigration. [Applause.]

Again, the gentleman from Illinois knows full well that it is the high tariff, or rather the war, more than anything else, that makes wages high at the present time; that it is because we must supply Europe now that wages are up. They never refer to the time prior to the breaking out of the war when they are talking about wages; it is just now. But men who understand anything of the present situation know full well what it is. We talk about Democratic prosperity——

Mr. SABATH. The figures that I gave the gentleman were the figures of 1912, before the war.

Mr. MEEKER. Very well, that was under a Republican administration. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] But I would not for a moment, under any administration, say that I wished to see American workmen anywhere in a Republican or Democratic administration be forced to accept wages below the American standard of living because some men from the other side have been brought in against them. You can not get away from that fact. We as Republicans only make ourselves ridiculous when we talk of a protective tariff against the product of cheap labor to be brought here, but nothing against the importations of cheap labor itself. The illiterate laborer is the man who takes the bottom of the line. Some Members talk as if we could not ever have any more railroads built if we became a literate Nation. They say that mining and all other industries of that kind would disappear if we become more particular as to who comes in.

Do you know that this afternoon while we are discussing the question of literacy the greatest nation the world ever saw, so far as efficiency is concerned, has for years been following an educational policy laid out under the supervision of a man who said that "illiteracy is a crime?" Do you know there is practically no soldier of the German Army that is not literate? Whenever you are making a plea for illiteracy you are making a plea to weaken the strong part of your national life. [Applause.] And whatever you may say as to one side or the other of the contest in Europe as a fighting force, you must admit that that nation which has kept itself at school, the nation that has stopped emigration from its borders, the nation that has made itself grow as no other has in Europe, has been developed in mind first before it has been developed in any other way.

EVERY PROBLEM FIRST ONE OF THE MIND.

Gentlemen, every great problem of this world was first worked out in intellect before it was worked out anywhere else. [Applause.] It is only because these men are able to think together that they can think clearly and in straight lines. Whenever you see a mob put against intelligence, intelligence will win with the odds 10 to 1 against it. [Applause.]

IF COMPULSORY EDUCATION FOR HOME, WHY NOT FOR THE FOREIGNER?

We men of the States who are talking seriously of education for our own people, how can we come here and boast of schools—how can we come and boast of laws—for our own people at home and at the same time say that the illiterate man may come marching in as he chooses? I believe in compulsory education. I believe it is the only mainstay of our Government.

NATIVE ILLITERACY A DISGRACE.

I want to say to men this afternoon who, from different States, come on the floor of the House, and some one asks you about the literacy in your own State—whatever there may be in Missouri or Indiana or Illinois or Alabama or any other State—it is just that much of a black mark on what should be a clean record.

We get nowhere by pointing the finger of scorn at ourselves, if we have not been faithful in forwarding the educational program of our own people. You beg the question when you say, "How about these people at home; why not let the illiterates come from the outside?" The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] is going to speak a little later, and he will give you some facts, not taken from the World's Almanac, but facts taken from the department, as to what the trend of illiteracy has been in this country since the bill was vetoed by our ex-President. It is well worth our while to stop and consider whether we should offer to the aliens of the Old World carte blanche in coming into our country or whether we should put somewhat of a premium upon citizenship. I want to say just in the closing moments that I have that I have grown somewhat impatient in the last few months hearing this constant appeal that Uncle Sam should always play favorite to some one else. We have always been asked to do the brotherly act. All the brotherly love and everything else is to come from our side.

THE BATTLE FOR DEMOCRACY HERE.

I have heard men say on this floor that a certain group of men in Europe are fighting the battles of democracy. Oh, no; the battles of democracy are to be fought out here. [Applause.] Any nation that maintains a king need not boast about genuine democracy, for it is playing at the game. It is high time that we men in our own Nation should begin to look primarily to the literacy of our people, for, without literacy, intelligence after all means but little. We men in this Nation should look first to the interests of our people, and any measure that will strengthen the intellectual power of this Nation should be welcomed by everybody. Any man who pleads for any other, certainly has not taken into account his own people first. [Applause.]

A great contest is being waged against this bill, and I ought to say that all of the lobbying, as you call it, is not all from one side. Do not fool yourselves for a moment into thinking that there are not plenty of forces being brought to bear on both sides of this question. Those who desire to use the illiterate to glut the labor market are on the job.

WE ARE FOR ABSOLUTE RELIGIOUS FREEDOM, BUT FOR KEEPING CHURCH OUT OF POLITICS.

We men in this country long ago discovered that the wisest thing to do for both the church and the State was to separate them. You will find no place in history where the church and State has joined hands that it did not ruin both of them. [Applause.]

I would say incidentally to some of you good gentlemen here on the floor of the House, who are the mouthpieces for a certain so-called reform organization that claims to be "the church in action," that the greatest menace you are bringing to this Nation is your introducing the church into politics through this organization. I refer to the Anti-Saloon League.

We think that the great danger in this country just now is the liberties of men. It was the desire for liberty that brought on the Revolutionary War. That was fought for liberty and not for law. There is no menace at this hour in this country that is greater than the increase of political power in this organization that says it represents the church.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. MEEKER. We learned that the state and the church must be kept apart, but at the same time there is nothing that should be so dear to a man as his religious conviction. From the time that the psalmist sung of his love for Jerusalem and of his right hand forgetting its cunning if he forgot Jerusalem down to now it has been the devotion that men and women have had for God as they know Him that has told the story of heroism, and their persecution is largely the history of bloodshed in the world. We have provided in this bill—and no man can deny it—that under the law any religious refugee from any land under the sun can find his asylum here. We have provided also for the political refugee. If we have not, it must be done before this bill goes into law. But after that asylum has been provided in those two particular cases, I say from that time on it is a question as to whether the American Congress shall stand for literacy in its Nation, for intelligence and enlightened conditions, or whether it shall continue to look into the dim distant past, when we rode in oxcarts, when we used tobacco for money, in the golden days that are gone we hope never to return.

Of all the flags flung to the breeze
In all the lands beneath the sun;
Of all the flags on all the seas,
I claim but one, I love but one.

There may be other flags for some
Which seem to be of equal worth,
But as for me that flag spells "home"—
It is the dearest flag on earth.

I love Old Glory most, because
No king can claim her as his own,
And from her spring great eagle claws
When anyone suggests a throne.

Baptized was she in blood of men,
And consecrated by the tears
Of brave though weeping women, when
They sent their loved ones forth with cheers.

The men who raised that flag waged war;
They bled, they died without complaint;
They knew what they were fighting for;
They gave themselves without restraint.

And so it is that here and now
We hoist thee, old "Red, White, and Blue,"
And underneath thy folds we vow:
"We'll fight for you; we love but you."

[Applause.]

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I was deeply interested in the statement of the previous speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER], regarding conditions in Germany. I agree with him fully as to what he said about the splendid education that the people of Germany receive in their schools and colleges and universities. I have traveled throughout the Empire on a number of occasions. I have seen great masses of workingmen employed in the construction of railroads. I want to say to you that practically every railroad laborer in Germany comes from Greece or southern Italy. I have seen them there by the thousands. Similar conditions existed prior to the present war in most of the countries of northern and western Europe. The German people, like our own people, who are educated, do not want to do that manual labor that compels them to stand on our western plains under the burning midday sun, earning their bread in the sweat of their brows. The educated American will not do that kind of work, and that work must be done in this country if the country is to attain its manifest destiny.

Take the history of the development of our country. The men who came to America and founded the colonies, the men whose posterity to-day are proud of the blue blood, as we jocosely call it, that flows through their veins, in many instances were so-called redemptioners, who could not read and who could not write, and who even did not have the money to pay their passage to the colonies. They lacked opportunity in their native land and hoped to find it on these hospitable shores. They came over here by the shipload, and when they arrived the master of the vessel rented them out at so much per year until they could work out their passage money. Such were many of the men and women who constituted our first families. Their descendants are not ashamed of these ancestors. They have no reason to be ashamed of their ancestors. But if there had been a literacy test in those days they never would have been allowed to land. They were illiterate because the opportunity to learn reading and writing had been denied them. Strike the literacy test from this bill, and I feel that almost every Member of the House will be willing to vote for it.

But, Mr. Chairman, the literacy test is no test of character. There are in the United States to-day thousands of young men who sprung from Irish immigrants. They constitute much of the bone and sinew of the land. They make splendid citizens. Yet in many, many instances their fathers and mothers could not read and write. That was not their fault. It was the fault of the conditions that existed in the country in which they were born. Take our own country to-day; take our country to-day in many of its sections. Do you find illiteracy? Of course you do. You find altogether too large a percentage of it. Do you blame the people in those sections? I hope not. It is not their fault. They have not had the proper opportunity. There are no schools to which they can go to learn how to read and write. Let us sweep our own doorsteps; let us educate all the people of these United States before we talk about illiteracy in other portions of the globe. Let us give every boy and girl, no matter what the race or creed or color, an opportunity in the United States [applause] to learn how to read and write. When we have done that, then we can criticize illiteracy, and not until then.

Take the great labor organization that is fighting for this legislation. Its president was born in England; its secretary was born in Canada; many of its officers were born abroad. They have made splendid records for themselves in the United States, and we are proud of the work that they have done for the uplift of the downtrodden and oppressed. This wonderful land of opportunity gave them the opportunity that might never have come to them had they been denied admission to this country. Why should they want to prevent other human beings from finding a similar opportunity in this land of the free?

Oh, the gentleman who preceded me [Mr. MEEKER] said that he was glad this country did not become involved in the war 18 months ago. He said he feared the American citizens of foreign birth——

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. MEEKER. I referred to the aliens who have gone back; not American citizens of foreign birth, but those 30,000 last year who went under other flags.

Mr. KAHN. There is one beautiful thing about it all, my friends, and that is this: When an alien comes to the United States and becomes an American citizen he generally becomes an intensely loyal, patriotic, devoted, American citizen. [Applause.] He is willing to lay down his life for this land of freedom. He teaches his boys as they grow to man's estate that it becomes their duty, if ever the country should call upon them to defend its institutions and its flag, it becomes their duty to respond to the colors in case of need and fight to the very death for this great Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. MEEKER. I want to ask the gentleman what in his opinion the men who have gone back under other flags, who are not our citizens, would have done in case of war; for which flag would they have fought?

Mr. KAHN. For the flag of this country, I honestly believe. They were not citizens of the United States; they were reservists, as I understand it, of other countries. This bill would not keep them out. They can all read and write. They were not illiterates. The gentleman would still allow them to enter this country. But, even as far as they are concerned, I believe if their respective countries had become involved in war with the United States they would have been ready to fight for the United States. [Applause.] I believe that honestly and sincerely of the many, many thousands of those who have come from foreign lands. Oh, they have a natural sympathy for the land of their birth; they would not be human if they had not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I can not just now. Walter Scott expressed it more beautifully than I have ever heard it expressed when he said:

Breathes there a man, with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,
This is my own, my native land!
Whose heart has ne'er within him burned,
As home his footsteps he hath turned,
From wandering on a foreign strand!
If such there breathe, go, mark him well;
For him no minstrel raptures swell;
High though his titles, proud his name,
Boundless his wealth as wish can claim;
Despite those titles, power, and pelf,
The wretch, concentrated all in self,
Living, shall forfeit fair renown,
And, doubly, dying, shall go down
To the vile dust from whence he sprung,
Unwept, unhonored, and unsung.

[Applause.]

Ah, Mr. Chairman, we have heard the loyalty of our foreign-born citizens and the descendants of foreign-born citizens seriously questioned in recent months. They have been referred to sarcastically as hyphenated Americans. I have constantly asserted that they did not hyphenate themselves. The American politicians hyphenated them for political purposes. They love the Union. No matter whether they or their fathers were born in other lands, they and their children are loyally devoted to these United States. And they will never hesitate to show their devotion in case this country should need their services in its defense.

Here in the United States we have a kind of hyphenated Americans among our own citizens. We have citizens of one State going to other States of the Union. For instance, we have in the State of California, a State which I have the honor to represent on this floor in part, native-born citizens from all over the Union. They are intensely loyal and patriotic and devoted Californians. But they invariably belong to the societies of their own States. The man from Vermont belongs to the Vermont Association. The man from Missouri belongs to the Missouri Society. The Ohioan belongs to the Ohio Society, the Mississippian, the Mississippi Society, and the New Yorker, the New York Society. Whenever New York does anything that is exceptionally laudable you will find your Californian who hails from New York proudly saying: "Oh, you little old New York, you bet." [Applause.]

Now, it is just the same with all these Europeans. They may have a sympathy for the land in which they first saw the light of day; but their hopes, their love, their devotion, their ambition, is centered in these United States of America. Here is where they have found opportunity. Here they have builded their homes. Here they have reared their children. Here even the unfortunate illiterate from foreign lands is giving those children the splendid advantages of an education that was denied the parents in the old country. I, for one, hope the doors of opportunity may still swing open for the downtrodden and the oppressed of every land. I would keep out the criminals, the mentally and physically defective, the anarchists, and the blackhanders. I would make character a test for admission. But I would never deny to those unfortunates who by reason of environment or social condition were unable to secure an education in their native lands the right to seek better surroundings, better educational facilities, better opportunities beneath the glorious Stars and Stripes.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON], and I understand that the gentleman from New York, my colleague [Mr. SIEGEL] is going to yield him a little time himself.

Mr. SIEGEL. I yield to the gentleman seven minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CASEY). The gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, as I do not expect to cover all the ground I want to cover in 15 minutes, I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LONDON. Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am not going to recite any poem, nor will I talk about my love for the flag. No man who really loves or respects his wife hires a brass band to advertise it.

I do not see why men permit themselves to be constantly proclaiming to the world how deeply they love the flag of the Republic. Let us come to the point.

The opposition to immigration is traceable to three principal sources. First, there is the chauvinist element, which fears contamination from foreign stock. They are the successors of the Anti-Alien movement, of the Know-Nothing movement, of the A. P. A. movement. This element is to be found in every country of the world. It is the man who is so proud of himself because of his birth in a particular land, and because of his ancestry, that he considers it superfluous that he amount to something himself. To the chauvinist Chinaman, his country is the Celestial Empire; to the Japanese, the Land of the Rising Sun; the German has, of course, the greatest culture; the Frenchman the noblest civilization; the Englishman rules the world; the Americans are, of course, the free and the brave.

While this sort of national frailty is excusable in old nations, Asiatic or European, it is utterly incomprehensible when found among the American people, full of the vigor of youth and absorbing unto itself all that is strong and virile in the human stock. This sort of man can not be reasoned with.

We come to the second element. We find year after year and Congress after Congress a solid vote for the restriction of immigration from the representatives of those States where children are exploited, where industry is undeveloped, where agriculture is in a primitive state, and where there is a particularly submissive class of labor.

These States suffer because of lack of immigration. Not only have they not developed their natural resources, but they have been suffering periodically from floods and inundations which they seem to be utterly incapable of coping with. The white immigrant, bringing with him the germs of discontent, coming here in quest of better opportunities, a rebel seeking a larger freedom, is feared by these elements. And the strange thing about it is that it is these very States that have an illiteracy of distressing proportions among the native white population.

Thus, Alabama, from which comes the distinguished author of this bill, has 15.7 per cent native white illiterates. North Carolina has 16 per cent; South Carolina, 15 per cent; Tennesee, 11 per cent; Louisiana, 17 per cent. One is tempted to ask the question why these gentlemen who are so opposed to illiteracy do not get busy in their own States.

Some of these States have an area larger than some of the Empires of Europe.

Alabama, with 52,000 square miles area, has a population of 2,270,000. Germany, with just four times the area of Alabama, or 208,000 square miles, has 67,000,000 people, or more than thirty times as many inhabitants as has this State.

Mississippi, with only 1,902,000 inhabitants, is larger than the combined area of Switzerland, Denmark, and Holland, though these three European countries support a total of 13,000,000 people in comparative comfort.

Texas, with a population of 4,250,000, is larger than France, Holland, Denmark, and Switzerland combined, with their 53,000,000 inhabitants.

Oregon, which is 10 per cent larger than England, Wales, and Scotland, has less than 1,000,000 people, as compared with the 42,000,000 in this British Isle.

Europe, almost identical in total area with the United States, supports a population of 450,000,000 souls.

There is something wrong with American statesmanship if America can not comfortably take care of 100,000,000 souls while Europe supports 450,000,000.

The third element is organized labor. We have organized labor invoked in support of this bill by elements which have consistently and persistently, in season and out of season, thwarted every effort and defeated every aspiration of the working people. It is true that a large number of the official representatives of the trades-unions ask for this bill. The working people, surrounded by enemies, engaged in a life and death struggle with the superior forces of capitalism, in sheer desperation seek to limit the supply of labor.

The trades-unions fear not only the competition of numbers but the rivalry of large masses of foreign workers not familiar with the language and easily exploitable.
